Oh, the gentleman from Indiana is entirely in error. Since I have been a member of this House we have appropriated for five or six dry docks on the naval appropriation bill, on the principle that it was for the maintenance of the naval establishment.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] says:

If the gentleman will pardon me, there is a distinction in principle between an appropriation for the construction of a dry dock in an existing navy-yard and where the yard does not exist.

I submit the quotations from the discussion of the point of order for the consideration of the Chair as well as for the consideration of the gentlemen from Maine, Messrs. BOUTELLE and DINGLEY.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am greatly complimented at being cited in this matter as a parliamentary authority. As I have never been fortunate enough to occupy a position which would enable me to make a ruling in this House, it is especially complimentary to have the gentleman rest his case on something that I said to Mr. Holman.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman on any question is never afraid of his record.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Just why the gentleman should have addressed his observations to me I am not entirely informed, because I have not made the point of order. I do not know just how far my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY], who did make the point of order, might feel himself concluded by those observations of mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the ruling is made, I wish simply to call attention to the fact that there has been but one ruling within my recollection in the House on the question as to whether an appropriation for the establishment of a dry dock is in order on an appropriation bill. All the rulings that have been made, except that one, have been on the question of new ships for the Navy. I have no doubt that the general law which authorizes the maintenance of a Navy authorizes the Committee on Naval Affairs to place in an appropriation bill an appropriation to authorize the construction of a new vessel. There is no doubt about that, because a vessel is the essential element in naval maintenance. A dry dock stands on a very different ground. The decision that I want to call attention to was made in the Fifty-second Congress. It is in the following words, as set forth in the Manual. I remember the decision very well:

A commission, acting under authority of Congress, having selected a site for a dry dock and navy-yard, but the work not having been authorized or actually in progress, a provision for the erection of such dry dock, etc., was held to be in conflict with the rule, and stricken from the bill on a point of order.

I recognize a distinction between this case and the case which has been presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In that case the commission had recommended the establishment of a navy-yard and dry dock, I think, at Algiers, and unquestionably a provision of that kind would be out of order on an appropriation bill. The only way in which a provision for building a dry dock in a navy-yard can be made in order on an appropriation bill must be under that provision of the rule which authorizes an appropriation for a continuing object already authorized by law. I think it probable that there is a dry dock now at the League Island Navy-Yard——

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, yes; since 1881.

Mr. DINGLEY (continuing). And that an appropriation for the enlargement or repair of that, it being already authorized by law, would be in order. But this amendment proposes to build another dry dock.

Mr. BINGHAM. The dry dock was authorized in the naval appropriation bill without any preceding statute or authority.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that, but no point of order was made.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know about that; I have not looked over the debate to see.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HOPKINS). The Chair is ready to rule. Rule XXI of the rules governing this body is identical with the rule that was adopted in the Fifty-first Congress. In that Congress, when the naval appropriation bill was under consideration, the identical question that is raised by the gentleman from Maine was then raised, and Mr. Butterworth of Ohio was at that time in the chair. The question was fully discussed, and after mature deliberation the Chair then held that the point of order was well taken.

The same question was raised when the naval bill was under consideration in the Fifty-second Congress. Mr. Shively of Indiana was then in the chair. The Chair has the RECORD before him, where the matter was fully discussed, and, while the Chair then recognized that previous to the Fifty-first Congress the ruling was as contended by the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, the Chair then felt constrained to hold, both on authority and precedent, that the point was well taken. In pursuance of those two precedents, the Chair will hold that the point made by the gentleman from Maine is well taken.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I understood that the paragraph beginning on page 19, "Navy-yard, Brooklyn, N. Y.," was passed over. I desire now to offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 1, after the words "New York," insert "wing and quay walls of dry dock No. 3, to be immediately available $60,000."

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I hope that will be inserted by unanimous consent.

Mr. CUMMINGS. It was ordered by the subcommittee, but was inadvertently omitted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The Senate committee provided $50,000 of a deficiency to complete this largest dock in New York, large enough for the largest battle ship, and this money is required to build the quay and wing walls at the entrance of this dock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the adoption of this amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

New buildings: For increase of appropriation (act of March 2, 1895) "for quarters for observers, two buildings, at $5,000 each, $10,000," $2,500.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill if he can give any idea when the Government will get through constructing exceedingly expensive quarters in the name of promoting science at the Observatory on the hill, but in reality as an encouragement of details from the Navy, the officers detailed having extra quarters at the public expense without benefit to science?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will suggest to me which part of that involved mass of misrepresentation and misstatements he desires me to address myself to I will try to tackle him.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman now, by way of direct statement, that the scientific corps at the Naval Observatory—misnamed naval; it is the astronomical observatory—does not consist in fact of anybody who is connected with the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thought you had just complained that that sort of people were sent there from the Navy.

Mr. CANNON. I say that the people who are detailed and occupy the expensive quarters which have been constructed there are people detailed from the Navy that do not know any more about astronomy than I do, and that is not much.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman if he can tell us when we will get through, in the name of encouraging science, with building these expensive quarters that are not occupied by scientists?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will answer the gentleman by explaining to him exactly what the Naval Committee is now recommending to this House in regard to the Naval Observatory.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). The estimates for which have in due course been submitted to us. We propose to do this: To increase the appropriation act of March 2, 1895, "for quarters for observers, two buildings, at $5,000 each, $10,000," the sum of $2,500. The buildings provided for are not for officers of the Navy. The item plainly discloses that they are not for officers of the Navy. They are for the observers at that station. The appropriation is not made this year. The appropriation was made last year. Advertisements for proposals were made, and the lowest bid for the construction of the buildings exceeded the amount appropriated by $2,500, and inasmuch as we have the finest observatory in many respects in the world, deliberately appropriated for and established by Congress, with an elaborate and expensive outfit of instruments, and being employed there under law, and I think under a law that is reported to the House annually by the committee of which my distinguished friend is chairman, we are simply providing for the houses in which these men detailed there are to live. It was not originated by the Committee on Naval Affairs, but by an appropriation bill which originated in the committee room of my friend the gentleman from Illinois. We are simply furnishing them with a roof to cover their heads in order that they can attend to their duties.

Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. BOUTELLE. One moment until I have finished.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield further to the gentleman out of my time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thought I was occupying a little time myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Go ahead.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I know the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is known to be always in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to strike out the last two words; and will say that this appropriation, which has caught the eagle eye of my friend, is an appropriation of $2,500 to enable an appropriation made last year to be availed of, to supply quarters for two astronomers who are stationed there, whose hours of work are indeterminate, who have to observe the stars when the stars choose and not when they choose, who are liable to be called there at all hours in the night, and who, until these quarters are provided, will be obliged to do as they have been doing, to go out from this city, or from wherever they may find board, to the Observatory at any and all hours to perform their duties.

There is nothing novel about this proposition. We have provided some quarters out there. I do not agree with my friend from Illinois in his description of them as of a palatial character. They would not be so regarded in the smaller communities around where I live, and certainly they would not be so regarded in Chicago, in the gentleman's own State. I think that they are fair, appropriate buildings for the purpose. The fact remains that the general legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill has provided for a force of, as I suppose, scientific people to carry on the work at the Observatory, and that this proposition is only following up the work that has been commenced, of supplying them with quarters, providing houses for two more of the observers who have been employed there for years, who are now employed, and who, I presume, will continue to be employed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment, and I can say in a minute, partly by restatement, what I desire to say about this miscalled Naval Observatory.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to suggest to my friend that it is hardly fair to precipitate a discussion here about the title of the Observatory. We all know that there has been a great deal of controversy about that, but I submit that it is not fair for him to reopen that discussion upon this bill. He is delaying the bill, and we have no right to discuss or settle that question on this occasion.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, it is now twenty minutes past 3 o'clock. We have transacted the ordinary morning business, and the gentleman has called up this bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs, which carries, as I understand—and I am not criticising the amount—substantially $30,000,000 or $31,000,000 and authorizes contracts for I do not know how much more, but I believe twenty or twenty-five millions. This bill, therefore, makes appropriation and authorization for perhaps $50,000,000, and now, at the hour of twenty minutes past 3 o'clock, when I in my quiet way propose to occupy probably five minutes to call attention to what I regard as an unwise provision in the bill—a small item as compared with the large appropriations contained in the bill, but still, I think, an unwise one—he complains that I am delaying his bill. I have no desire to obstruct or delay this bill. I only want to call attention to a matter to which I think it is proper that the attention of the House and of the country should be directed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What does the gentleman want to do about this matter? Does he object to this $2,500 appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. If I can get five minutes to myself, I will try to tell the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, I want to ask the gentleman one other question: Does he think it is fair to bring up for discussion this question, which has run through Congress after Congress, between the friends and the foes of the Naval Observatory, as to what kind of institution it shall be? Does he think that is a proper subject for discussion here now?

Mr. CANNON. I think I will show that it is proper in so far as it comes up for consideration now. The miscalled Naval Observatory, Mr. Chairman, does not dwell in the sea. It dwells here on Columbia Heights, away above tide water, but unfortunately many years ago it was unguardedly placed under the Secretary of the Navy. Since that time the new Observatory has been builded. It is a magnificent Observatory, and I am glad and proud of it, because it is right and proper that our Government should keep step with scientific progress touching all such matters. So much for that. But the Observatory is, in letter, under the Navy Department, and what is the result? The result is a lot of buildings, buildings that ought to have been constructed at private expense, but that have been constructed at the public expense, splendid residences, buildings not necessary for the observation of the stars, but erected to be occupied by these scientific employees that are paid from the public Treasury.

There they are, and they are occupied by favored naval officers who are detailed nominally to promote astronomical observations, but who really are planted upon that appropriation and that reservation, without knowing any more about astronomy than the average member of Congress. [Laughter.] And now, instead of putting them out, as the Secretary of the Navy might well do in the exercise of a wise administrative discretion, the gentleman from Maine comes here and reports this provision to build more quarters for the scientific observers. Now, if these Government officers, who do not know anything about astronomy, are to live in that respectable-sized village at the Observatory, in the name of astronomy, I suppose you ought to build these quarters. But, pray, under what rule of the House does the Committee on Naval Affairs, which reports these magnificent appropriations for the construction of the Navy to sail upon the waters of the deep blue sea—and which rightfully exercises that jurisdiction—under what rule of the House does that committee get jurisdiction to recommend appropriations to build quarters for these scientific observers? That is what I wanted to say. I hope the time will come when somebody will have the leisure and the power to take this miscalled Naval Observatory from the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy and put it under scientific superintendence and direction, and that these buildings, so far as may be necessary, will be occupied by the real scientific corps. Whenever that is done they will all be properly housed, and the United States Government will have rooms to let. That is all I want to say.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, let me say one word to my friend from Illinois. Since I have been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs two separate attempts have been made to transfer the Naval Observatory from the care of the Navy Department to scientists. That committee has given patient hearings hour after hour to gentlemen from Dudley Observatory, from Harvard Observatory, and elsewhere; and after such hearings in two different Congresses the committee has reported unanimously against the proposition.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that anything further is necessary to be said on this subject. It strikes me that my friend from Illinois can hardly feel a great degree of satisfaction in what he has said. To interpolate here a discussion as to the desirability of continuing one of the establishments of the Government under the control and supervision that have obtained for many years is, it seems to me, hardly pertinent to an appropriation to furnish quarters for officers who are to-day lawfully assigned to duty at that station.

The question as to whether the Naval Committee or the Appropriations Committee should have jurisdiction was one that the gentleman did not disclose when he rose. I do not think that the Naval Committee feels a great deal of pride about appropriating for a few buildings here and there; but we do feel a pride in responding appropriately to the demands of this Government as made to us through the proper sources when they commend themselves to our judgment and when we find that the law of the United States as passed through this House under the scrutiny and control and management of the gentleman from Illinois has provided this very year for a Naval Observatory. If this institution is misnamed, it is misnamed in the gentleman's bill as well as in ours. In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill as passed through this House only a few days ago provision is made as usual under the head of "Naval Observatory." I do not find that it is designated in that bill the "miscalled Naval Observatory." It seems to me that upon that bill there was an opportunity for the gentleman from Illinois to correct the title of this institution if he thought it ought to be done. I find in that bill appropriations for pay of assistant astronomers, etc., going through the whole body of people who are provided for to look after this work at that Observatory. We have simply put into our bill a provision for a small appropriation to enable the Superintendent to put under contract two buildings for the astronomical observers at that place. I do not think the Committee on Naval Affairs are subject to criticism for this item; and I do not think anyone will wish to strike it out. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last three words. I simply want to controvert the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] concerning the Naval Observatory. As I understand his complaint—and I presume he has made it all along the line since he has been in Congress—it is that the naval officers in charge of the Naval Observatory are not competent for the work they do there. Is that the contention of the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON. I say that officers detailed from the Navy have no more business to be stationed at the Naval Observatory, and in fact no more right, so far as the advancement of science is concerned, than officers of the Army or any other people who are not skilled in astronomy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman ever visited the Naval Observatory?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know what scientific work is done there by the officers of the Navy?

Mr. CANNON. General superintendence, I suppose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Allow me to say to the gentleman from good information upon the question that the highest scientific knowledge contained in the brains of any set of men in the United States relative to astronomy has been wrought out by the officers of the Navy detailed to be placed in charge of the Naval Observatory. Those officers have to prepare—and it requires very high scientific knowledge—the Nautical Almanac or Ephemeris, which must be prepared two or three years in advance for the use of navigators. Without this work no vessel upon the high seas can be properly scientifically navigated. The whole care and regulation of the chronometers by which the longitude at sea is ascertained devolves upon the naval officers and Superintendent at that Observatory. The tabulating and cataloguing of the stars, which are necessary for observations in navigation, is a matter that has been going on for years at that Observatory.

The scientific work connected with the weather bureau and with correlative subjects has always been under the direction and supervision of the British navy, and Admiral Fitzroy of the British navy gained a world-wide reputation by reason of his high attainments and scientific knowledge connected with this work. So have some officers detailed from our Navy and in charge of the Naval Observatory. The gentleman commanding there now, Commodore Phythian, who prior to this duty was Superintendent of the Naval Academy, is one of the most scientific of the officers of the Navy, and for that reason was detailed there. If the gentleman from Illinois will make inquiry, which he has not done (for apparently he has drawn a large draft upon his ignorance, and it has been honored), if he will inquire of any scientific gentleman of high attainment in this country he will find that the work done at the Naval Observatory by officers detailed from the Navy is of the foremost scientific character.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a Daniel has come to judgment and a Solomon is amongst us—a man who not only has exhausted this question, but has brought the X ray to bear upon the knowledge of his brother Representatives—a man who can see all through people to discover ignorance or the want of knowledge. [Laughter.] I am glad we have our friend with us.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I am willing to sit at the feet of this Gamaliel from Illinois——

Mr. CANNON. Let us see who is ignorant——

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Upon this question.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Upon this question. The gentleman has given us information. He has told us some facts and has turned the light of his intellect upon the House to give us the benefit of that information. Let us see whether it is information, however, or misinformation he has given us. I hold in my hand a copy of the current law, to which reference has been made. The gentleman says the Nautical Almanac——

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. The work connected with its preparation.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Is made up by the commodores who sail the seas. See, now, how plain a tale will put him down. I hold in my hand the appropriation for the current year, and what do I find?

Nautical Almanac Office: For the following assistants for preparing the American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac, three clerks at $1,600, two at $1,400, three at $1,200, two at $1,000; a copyist, a typewriter, assistant messenger, laborers, etc.; in all, $15,480.

Under whose charge? Prof. Simon Newcomb's charge; and in so far as I have inquired about it—and I doubt if the gentleman from Pennsylvania has done so—so far as the Nautical Almanac is concerned there is no naval officer detailed or otherwise who knows any more about it or its preparation than a Sioux Indian does about trigonometry. [Laughter.]

Now, I am not speaking disrespectfully of our gallant naval officers. That is not the question presented. They were not educated to be experts along this line.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Why, the name of Commodore Maury, as a scientist, is known the whole world over.

Mr. CANNON. And yet he has been dead for many years.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. But his work lives after him.

Mr. CANNON. And he was an exception; a great scientist, an intelligent man——

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Yes; and a naval officer.

Mr. CANNON. And a naval officer; but is that a reason why men who do not know any more about astronomy than a seaman in the Navy should be appointed to these places, or be detailed here or elsewhere, to take charge of such a work?

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Why, they are educated in that very science.

Mr. CANNON. I do not yield. I say is there any reason why these men should be detailed to occupy these residences in the name of science, in the name of astronomy?

So much for the Nautical Almanac. "Very ignorant," I confess I am, but I happen to know a little about this Nautical Almanac business and who are detailed for the work.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me a moment to ask him to send for the Nautical Almanac and see who prepares it?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, there is the law under which it is prepared.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. The Nautical Almanac itself will show you who prepares it.

Mr. CANNON. I am content with the law. I will accept that, although the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not thrown the X ray as clearly as he seems to have imagined on the preparation of the Nautical Almanac.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will you kindly tell us what position is held by the gentleman who he states prepares the Nautical Almanac?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it is prepared under direction of Professor Newcomb.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But what is his office?

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. He is an officer in the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman from Illinois state what his office is?

Mr. CANNON. I say that he is a naval officer.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You said a little while ago that this was not prepared by a naval officer.

Mr. CANNON. I said that the men provided for in this bill, the section of which I read, and who prepared this work, were not naval officers. Professor Newcomb has been for years regarded as a distinguished scientist, and is at the head of the work.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But what is his position?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, he is at the head of the Nautical Almanac Office.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Will you state——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, who is making this speech? [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. CANNON. Now, a word as to the Naval Observatory. We have 23 employees in civil life appropriated for from year to year, their bare salaries costing $37,160—they do all the work——

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I deny it.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Watching the stars up there at the Observatory.

Mr. BOUTELLE. They are the men for whom we are providing houses.

Mr. CANNON. Now, what have we? We have this Observatory up there, with room enough for a prince to live in, to house these 23 men or employees that are not all housed there; and now the gentleman tacks on an item of appropriation to this bill—a bill to build ships—to build houses. And what for? To build houses, if you please, out here upon these Observatory grounds.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now, right here, will my friend allow me?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should like to ask a question.

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. There is time enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. CANNON. Now, my object in calling attention to this was that the attention of the House might be directed toward it, and I wanted also to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], kindly and not offensively, to the fact that in my judgment, as one member of the House at least, his committee does not rightfully have jurisdiction except as to that which pertains to the Navy, and that this does not, in fact, pertain to the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, right there——

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. If I have succeeded in directing the attention of the House to it I have accomplished my object. Now, if the gentleman desires in my time to ask me a question, I will answer it if I can.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not want to ask you a question; I want to state a fact.

Mr. CANNON. That is right. Then I yield the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has succeeded in one thing, and that is in setting up his judgment as to the jurisdiction of a committee against the judgment of the entire House of Representatives as expressed at every session of Congress for a long period of years. And as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I absolutely repudiate his right to challenge the jurisdiction of my committee to report back to this House matters that this House has specifically given into our jurisdiction by a vote. It is the most astonishing proposition that I ever heard. Here are the estimates of the United States Government for the naval establishment, and this Book of Estimates contains on its face, where the gentleman must have seen it if he had familiarized himself enough with this matter to justify him in arresting the progress of this bill, this item as one of the items of the estimates of the Government sent here for the action of Congress. It is in the regular Book of Estimates and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which committee has been given jurisdiction over every one of these items, specifically, by the vote of this House. I submit—I would say, if it were not perhaps a harsh expression—that it seems to me like trifling with the time of this House for any man to get up here, no matter if he holds so distinguished a position as the chairman of all the other appropriation committees of the House, and challenge the jurisdiction of a committee over an item which has been put in its jurisdiction by order of this House. If the gentleman's authority is to override that of the House, then the jurisdiction may be taken from us; but until this House nullifies and changes the specific jurisdiction that it has given to us, not only at this session but at every session of Congress during the thirteen years that I have had the honor to be a member—and in some of that time the gentleman has not been here, and about that he may be ignorant—for thirteen years I have sat here and seen the Committee on Naval Affairs given complete and specific jurisdiction over this matter.

Now, I only want to say one word more, and that in the briefest possible manner. I did not enter into that, because I do not want to precipitate a discussion. I do not think it is a proper thing, I do not think it is a fair thing to bring up here an old controversy between gentlemen who claim to be all of the scientific world outside as to the naval jurisdiction over this bureau, which it has held for years with distinction and honor. But I want to repudiate for myself the slightest sympathy with any word of criticism that the gentleman from Illinois has applied to the distinguished naval officers who have been detailed to that institution. Instead of being ignoramuses and unfitted for their duties, they have been the most brilliant ornaments of the American Navy; and I want to give the gentleman a piece of exclusive information, as it would seem, so far as he is concerned, that the United States Navy embraces some of the brightest, some of the most accomplished scientists in the civilized world. [Applause.]

To detail a naval officer to an institution does not carry with it the supposition that an ignorant man has been detailed. It carries on its face the presumption that you have sent there one of the best educated, one of the best equipped men that can be found in the United States, and if he is not such he is unfit to be in the Navy. If he is not such he has in some way escaped the vigilance which has so sifted the cadetships that almost every member of Congress has been making an outcry during the last ten or fifteen years that they were too strict at that Academy. The name of M. F. Maury is held to-day in distinction, not only throughout the scientific world, but every shipmaster knows and appreciates the value of his services in the establishment of his great system of observations for the wind and current charts. The name of Admiral C. H. Davis is enrolled where the gentleman from Illinois can not disturb it, among the names of the scientists of the world who have rendered illustrious and distinguished service, and coming down from that time to this I would be unwilling, I would be ashamed to concede that we have so far retrograded that a Navy which thirty years or twenty or ten years ago could supply brilliant scientific men to put at the head of this Naval Observatory no longer contains a man of sufficient scientific attainment to warrant putting him at the head of that great institution.

I believe that to-day the gentleman who is assigned as Superintendent is finely equipped for those duties. He came there from where? He came there from the chiefship of the great naval instruction institution of this country—from the Superintendency of the Naval Academy; and as the superintendent of the Naval Academy no better hostage as to his fitness could be asked than that he is a man capable of directing the instruction of all future naval officers for a series of years. Certainly he ought to be fit to be the head of the Naval Observatory. I regret that an attack has been made upon the naval officers or the Naval Observatory, and I regret particularly that this bill has been held up for half or three-quarters of an hour on a proposition to add $2,500 to an appropriation to put up some necessary quarters for two observers at that institution.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the amendment, but if the gentleman from Illinois is going to make another speech on the question I have another one ready.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized on his amendment.

Mr. CANNON. With the consent of the distinguished gentleman from Maine, I ask my other distinguished friend to withhold his threat——

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I made no threat.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). While in an humble way, as an ordinary Representative of the House, who has been sent here by a constituency, I shall in the short space of three or four or five minutes modestly exercise my right in this great presence to at least ask a question and express my disapproval about administration or appropriations. But it seems that the gentleman from Maine will not have any question raised touching any item, great or small, in this bill. What is it being considered in the committee for?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman made no proposition to modify the bill. Will the gentleman make a motion?

Mr. CANNON. I have made a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. The gentleman from Illinois must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. CANNON. I entitled myself under the rules of the House to the floor. I am a Representative, along with the gentleman; and so long as I am I will not submit to lectures from the gentleman when I exercise my right as a member here.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will not you submit to other gentlemen exercising their rights?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then we will get along all right.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to the gentleman, and I sat tolerably quiet listening to all the gentleman said. "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he is grown so great" that I can not even ask a question about the bill or express a doubt as to its wisdom? So much for that. I find I am to be lectured by the gentleman from Maine for making, as he claims, an attack upon the magnificent personnel of the Navy. It has been magnificent. I believe it is magnificent. I have very great respect for it. The officers of the Navy were educated at public expense, bright men and strong men, skilled in navigation and the command of ships, and I want them to follow their calling. That is not their calling out here at the Observatory gazing at the stars in the heavens or the stars on earth.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is not for you to judge, or rather to decide.

Mr. CANNON (approaching Mr. BOUTELLE). May I humbly and modestly be permitted to express my opinion upon the question? [Great laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think the gentleman from Illinois ought not to try an experiment in a new character upon so important a bill as this. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, I only want to state again, when I first arose I had no thought of attacking the jurisdiction, real or claimed, of the Committee on Naval Affairs. But while you are talking about jurisdiction of committees, let me say the gentleman from Maine well knows, and every other member of the House that has had considerable experience on the subject of appropriations, that it is a favorite scheme for executive officers, when they can not get appropriations recommended under the jurisdiction of one committee, to shift around and submit estimates for appropriation so that they will come in under another committee. I state again, that I do not think the Committee on Naval Affairs substantially, under the rules of the House, had jurisdiction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, now I have not troubled the House very often in five years' service, but I intend to make a few remarks on this subject.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope my colleague will be listened to. He is a member of the committee and has served for years in the United States Navy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. There is no need to apologize for my speech. I shall speak in my own right as a Representative. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am not apologizing for the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, on all questions of legislation outside of those connected with the United States Navy, I am perfectly willing to submit to the superior experience and information of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], but if I may be pardoned for a personal statement, I am a graduate of the Naval Academy, and I served for eleven years in the United States Navy, and I therefore feel that I may speak with some measure of authority on this subject. From information and knowledge—and I think I am a good witness—I wish to say, and this is the only point upon which I take issue with the gentleman from Illinois, that the officers of the Navy detailed for work at the Naval Observatory perform duty similar to that which is performed by naval officers in England and that they are gentlemen of the highest scientific attainments. If they were not capable of compassing all the scientific knowledge that is necessary to be brought to bear in the work of that Observatory, they certainly would not be detailed for such a conspicuous position, and the gentleman from Illinois ought to know that the scientists of this country would rise up in protest against this Congress, or against the appointing authority, if officers were detailed for such duty who were not fully qualified to perform it to the satisfaction of the country.

Mr. MILES. Have we not had one scientific gentleman protesting on the floor of this House this afternoon in the person of the gentleman from Illinois? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and now we have a second.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I desire to say further, Mr. Chairman, that when the gentleman attempts to state and to put it upon record that our naval officers who are detailed for this business are not capable of doing the work, I take issue with him in toto. I do not know whether he is the gentleman or not, but I think it must have been the gentleman from Illinois in his early days in Congress of whom a certain story is told. At all events the principal in it was a gentleman from some western portion of the country—and I have no indictment to make against the great West, because even so great a man as Grover Cleveland got into trouble the other day by attempting that. [Laughter.] However, if my information is correct, it must have been the gentleman from Illinois, who in his pristine days in Congress was invited to go down the Potomac upon one of the Government vessels. He accepted the invitation, and walking around the deck of the vessel examining all things in his scientific and inquisitorial way, he happened to look down over the main hatchway, whereupon he raised his hands and exclaimed, "Great God, she's holler." [Great laughter.]

Probably during his long and creditable career in Congress (interrupted only while he was out on the treeless prairies for two years on one occasion not long ago) he has acquired more information about naval affairs than he had at the beginning; still he has not yet gathered to himself sufficient information, scientific or otherwise, to justify him in stating that the officers of the Navy are lacking in scientific knowledge—the men who can make the computations contained in this book I hold in my hand (the Nautical Almanac), upon which our commerce rests; because the scientific knowledge required for the safe conduct on the highways of the sea of our commercial and national marine is obtained from the material furnished in this book, and the work upon which these computations are based is done by naval officers in great part, is of greatest scientific character, and is superintended entirely by a distinguished naval officer, a master of the sciences as well, Commodore Robert L. Phythian.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the five last words. [Laughter.] For the sake of peace I plead guilty to all that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, and, if he wishes, to all that he will say, including the story about going down the Potomac and all that. [Laughter.] I do live out in the Mississippi Valley. I did not have the benefit of a training at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, as my friend from Pennsylvania had. That was my misfortune, and it was his good fortune that he had that training and that he had eleven years' service as an officer in the Navy, serving the people of this country, of whom I am one.

I have been frequently surprised in my service in this House of Representatives at the fact that no man sitting here as a Representative and the peer of every other Representative can rise in his place and criticise any abuse, or what seems to be an abuse, in administration when it touches an officer of the Navy, magnificent and splendid as those officers are and well able to stand on their real merits, but what there rushes to the front some defender who has zeal if not knowledge. And so, after the gentleman from Pennsylvania has ceased to be an officer in the Navy and is a Representative in this House, from a love of old associations, or probably from pride of profession, he rushes in to defend what is, in my judgment, a misappropriation of the services of his former colleagues. I may be wrong about it, but that is my judgment, whether I knew that the ship that went down the Potomac was "holler" or not. [Laughter.] And let me say to my friend that upon these subjects I am just about as wise as my constituents.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAHON. You know that a schooner is hollow, do you not? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I confess it. There is no man in the House that can make the assertion with greater positiveness and safety than the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Now, then, behold what a great matter comes from asking in a legitimate way a question. I have asked a question; I have made my protest. I have not made it every year, I believe. Only once before in my life, so far as I have any recollection, have I called attention to this abuse (and I am not abusing anybody when I say that) in the public service. I believe it ought to be corrected. I hope I shall live long enough to see it corrected by law.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now, will the gentleman from Illinois be kind enough——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move to strike out the last word; and I want to ask my friend from Illinois whether he will be kind enough to suggest what there is in this bill at this point to which he objects and what he desires to have changed.

Mr. CANNON. I will very gladly accommodate the gentleman. I believe that the substance of the rule would be observed and that good administration and appropriation would be promoted if the gentleman would rise in his place and move to strike out the appropriation for the completion of these buildings.

Mr. BOUTELLE. On what ground? They are recommended by the Department.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. They are in conformity with a law that has been passed by Congress. The question is simply whether we shall appropriate $2,500 in accordance with law; that is all. If we do not put in this provision for quarters it will not take away any of the "observers" that are already provided for. The gentleman and his committee have provided for "observers" going there. We are simply housing them. Unless the gentleman desires to make some motion, I hope we shall go on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I have answered the gentleman's question; and I have stated what I believe to be the merits of this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction of a similar additional ward to increase needed capacity of hospital, $25,000, which sum shall be paid from that portion of the naval hospital fund accruing from the sale of naval hospital grounds to the city of Brooklyn, and placed to the credit of the naval hospital fund in pursuance of the provisions of the act approved July 2, 1890.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] who a moment ago was right by me made a statement on this floor which was historically inaccurate.

In speaking of—

Gentlemen on the other side—meaning, of course, Democrats on this side of the House, and also speaking of—men who served in the Confederacy—

the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] said:

They voted solidly to put Fitz John Porter on the retired list; they voted solidly that Ulysses S. Grant should not go on that list.

When this statement was questioned and was sought to be corrected, the gentleman from Maine replied:

They all voted against it.

This language of Mr. BOUTELLE was certainly susceptible of no other construction than that the Democratic party voted solidly against the bill to restore General Grant to the retired list, and especially that those who served in the Confederacy particularly opposed and voted solidly against this measure, and it certainly carried with it the conclusion that this included the entire Congress, both Senate and House.

This statement was so contrary to the truth that I denied it with great emphasis, and if I made my denial any broader than I should, Mr. BOUTELLE more than any other man was responsible for it. On the 3d of March, 1885, Mr. BOUTELLE rose in his seat just as the session was about to close and said (I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2567):

GENERAL U. S. GRANT.

Mr. BOUTELLE addressed the Chair.
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Maine rise?
Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask unanimous consent to make an announcement that will occupy but a few seconds, and that I know will be of great interest.
There was no objection.
Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I have the great pleasure of announcing to the representatives of the people that the Senate of the United States, in open session and by a unanimous vote, has confirmed the nomination of Ulysses S. Grant as General of the Army of the United States on the retired list. [Applause.]

With this statement from Mr. BOUTELLE on my mind, is it surprising that in recurring without a moment's reflection upon an occurrence of more than eleven years ago I should have made my statement a little broader than was justified by the facts? I immediately afterwards endeavored to get the gentleman's permission to correct my statement and to make it conform strictly to the fact, and I continued my efforts during all of Mr. BOUTELLE'S occupancy of the floor, not alone to correct my slight error, but also to correct the gross misstatement of the gentleman from Maine. When I appealed to the gentleman, as shown on page 3153, the RECORD says:

Mr. BOUTELLE. Wait a moment.

Which certainly was giving me to understand that if I waited a moment he would give me an opportunity.

Again, on the same page, I appealed to him and he replied:

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am going to take one thing at a time; you come next. [Laughter.] I can not take South Carolina and Alabama all at once.
Mr. WHEELER. They are two pretty good States.
Mr. BOUTELLE. They are, and I do not want to get into antagonism with both of them at the same time.

This certainly was an intimation to me that I should have an opportunity to make the correction. The gentleman, however, did not allow me any such opportunity, and I availed myself of the privilege of correcting my statement, which was done immediately as the House adjourned, so that when the papers were sent to Mr. BOUTELLE for correcting his speech he would see my correction, and my hope was that he would then correct his fearful misstatement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a great many gentlemen who were members of this House and of the Senate opposed the bill upon the ground that General Grant was in business and was the compeer of any financial man in the country. It is a matter of record that in the Military Committee of the House in the Forty-seventh Congress, when that bill was brought up, a distinguished Republican, who had been a soldier, met it with a resolution that whereas General Grant had shown himself to be the compeer of the most distinguished financial men in the country he did not need the salary, and he moved that the bill be not reported favorably. That motion against the bill was voted for by every Republican in the committee, as I recall the facts, and the bill was not opposed by any Democrat. That is my recollection.

Now, when the Senate bill came before the House, so far from correct is the gentleman from Maine in saying that it was solidly opposed by the Democrats, 77 Democrats voted in this House for the bill on the yea-and-nay vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I object.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. STALLINGS. If I can be recognized I will yield my time.

Mr. WHEELER. Now, Mr. Chairman, my purpose in rising and correcting the gentleman was to preserve the truth of history, and not allow a statement to go into the RECORD of this Congress that was entirely without foundation.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman kindly state what statement he referred to was "entirely without foundation"?

Mr. WHEELER. The statement I read of the gentleman from Maine which appears in the RECORD. A statement to the effect that everybody on this side of the House, every Democrat, solidly voted to put Fitz John Porter on the retired list of the Army and solidly voted against putting General Grant upon the retired list.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Who voted against it?

Mr. WHEELER. You had gone on and spoken of those on this side, and those who served in the Confederacy, and the House understood, and the whole country would have understood, it to mean that the whole Democratic party and all who served in the Confederacy voted solidly against the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think not. I think the statement should be clearly understood, and that it refers to those members who served in the Confederate army.

Mr. WHEELER. And in contradiction of that statement I find at a glance, without counting the other names, at least 10 in the House who voted for the bill in question and 15 in the Senate who voted for the bill were in the Confederate army. I also see that 20 Democratic Senators voted for the bill and every Democrat in the Senate voted for the confirmation of General Grant's appointment, and, as stated, 77 Democrats in the House voted for the bill. It is true that there were 78 votes against the bill, but they were not all Democrats.

Now, since I have had the honor of being a member of the House I have several times been the subject of attack by the gentleman from Maine, but I have never replied——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to say to the gentleman that I made no attack upon him whatever. I have never referred to him in any way.

Mr. WHEELER. Now, I have never replied to any of these attacks because I have never had any feeling of animosity against or other than kindly feelings toward the gentleman. My feelings have always been those of sympathy, commiseration, and pity. [Laughter.] I dislike to see a man in the situation of my distinguished friend from Maine on yesterday, to stand solidly and alone in opposition to a measure which met the approval of the entire House and the whole country. I could not take the floor myself upon it. I could not vote upon it. There was a manifest impropriety in my speaking upon it, and I should never have alluded to it again had not the gentleman this morning got up and criticised my making a slight change in order to make what I said tell the exact truth; and, as I tried to say this morning, it was done largely so that when the manuscript of his remarks went to the gentleman, as they were to go to him, he would learn the facts and correct his remarks so that they would tell the truth also. But the gentleman did not do it, but allowed his remarks to remain in the RECORD as incorrectly uttered by him, when the gentleman must have known himself that his statement was not accurate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that eleven years have elapsed since that vote was taken the purpose of the gentleman from Maine evidently must have been an attempt to convince the people of the North that the Southern people were inimical to every measure that sought to honor the Federal soldiers. The gentleman ought to know that the Southern people have always honored the brave men of the Federal Army who stood in the first of battle; and if he will examine the records he will find that Democratic Congresses have reported bills to appropriate twice as much money to pension Federal soldiers as have ever been reported by Republican Congresses. The Democrats have always done their full duty to their country.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to find it necessary, or expedient rather——

A MEMBER. Oh, let us go on with the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not want to be placed in the position of having made a statement in the way attributed to me by the gentleman from Alabama who has just spoken. But I should not have referred to the matter again if the gentleman had not addressed the committee, and will now say what I was prevented from saying when I sought the floor this morning. I do not propose to be left in the position of making a statement in regard to the votes of the members of the other side of the House that I did not make, and could not have made, and did not intend to make, a statement which could have been made from no other motive except malice.

I had no idea of saying that all the Democrats on that side of the House voted against the bill for the retirement of General Grant. On the contrary, I expressly stated that the distinguished Democrat from Pennsylvania, Samuel J. Randall, was active in support of the bill. What I did say in the discussion on yesterday was:

Gentlemen over here will perhaps say: "Oh, I do not like to take a position which may be misconstrued or criticised by somebody and place me in an attitude inimical to the views and desires of our brethren who were on the Confederate side in the late rebellion." My friends, the gentlemen on the other side—

Those gentlemen, of course everybody understands—have never hesitated one moment in advocating their side of all these controversies.

I certainly was not referring to the Democratic party in this statement. It is obvious that I was not, for there were Union generals on that side.

No man who served in the Confederacy felt at all estopped because he had participated in the rebellion from opposing the putting of General Grant on the retired list. No gentleman over there, so far as I know, felt estopped in the slightest degree from acting as a juror in the great case of the Union against Fitz John Porter when he was retired. They voted solidly to put Fitz John Porter on the retired list; they voted solidly that Ulysses S. Grant should not go on that list.

Whereupon the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], according to the reporter's notes, and as I believe the gentleman now concedes, said:

Will the gentleman tell us the name of one man who voted against the passage of that bill for Gen. Ulysses S. Grant?

The reply to that was:

They all voted against it.

Of course everybody understood when I said "they all voted against it" that I was referring to ex-Confederate members of this House. Then the gentleman from Alabama said:

The House voted unanimously for the bill; there was not a single vote against it.

I said nothing about the Senate. There was no member of this body better aware of the fact that the Senate voted unanimously in favor of that proposition, because I came over here and made the announcement myself. I did not make any accusation against the gentleman. I simply put my question of privilege on the ground that the RECORD had been altered in a way to do injustice to my accuracy, and I left the responsibility to be fixed as it might be. As a matter of fact, the RECORD shows that I was entirely correct. If there was one member who served in the Confederacy who did vote for General Grant, I regret that I did not know it and state it. I would have stated it if I had known it. There were 78 Democrats who voted against putting General Grant on the retired list. Fifty-eight of them were from the South, and of those 58 members, every one who was present at the succeeding session, to the number of 51, voted to bestow upon Fitz John Porter the honor they had refused to General Grant.

Now, for the accuracy of history, I will read that the nay vote on the 3d of March, 1885, on the direct question of placing General Grant on the retired list of the United States Army, was:

Alexander,	Crisp,	Lanham,	Singleton,
Ballentine,	Culberson, D. B.	McMillin,	Skinner, T. G.
Barbour,	Davidson,	Matson,	Smith, A. Herr
Barksdale,	Davis, L. H.	Miller, J. F.	Stewart, Charles
Belmont,	Dibrell,	Mills,	Stockslager,
Bennett,	Dockery,	Money,	Swope,
Blackburn,	Dowd,	Muldrow,	Taylor, J. M.
Blanchard,	Eaton,	Neece,	Tucker,
Blount,	Eldredge,	Oates,	Turner, H. G.
Buchanan,	Forney,	O'Ferrall,	Turner, Oscar
Buckner,	Geddes,	Patton,	Van Eaton,
Cabell,	Gibson,	Pierce,	Warner, Richard
Caldwell,	Green,	Price,	Wellborn,
Clay,	Halsell,	Pryor,	Winans, E. B.
Clements,	Hammond,	Reagan,	Wise, G. D.
Cobb,	Hatch, W. H.	Reid, J. W.	Wolford,
Cook,	Hemphill,	Reese,	Wood,
Cosgrove,	Hewitt, G. W.	Rogers, J. H.	Woodward,
Covington,	Hill,	Rosecrans,	Yaple.
Cox, W. R.	Jones, J. H.	Shively,

The affirmative vote was 198, and there were, I am glad to say, a large number of Democrats who voted for it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Were there any War Democrats who voted in the negative?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yes; I see two or three. And of the 78 Democrats who voted in the negative there were 58 who had served in the Confederacy.

Mr. WHEELER. Seventy-seven Democrats voted the other way.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS.

Provisions, Navy: For provisions and commuted rations for the seamen and marines, which commuted rations may be paid to caterers of messes, in cases of death or desertion, upon orders of the commanding officer, commuted rations for officers on sea duty and naval cadets, and commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited to the naval hospital fund, subsistence of officers and men unavoidably detained or absent from vessels to which attached under orders (during which subsistence rations to be stopped on board ship and no credit for commutation therefor to be given), and fresh water for drinking and cooking purposes, $1,275,000; labor in general storehouses and paymasters' offices in navy-yards, including expenses of handling stores purchased under the naval supply fund, a chemist at $2,000 per annum, $130,000; in all, $1,405,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if that is the section that there was some complaint made about? The gentleman from California [Mr. HILBORN] who is a member of the committee knows what I refer to. Is this the commuted-ration business that complaint was made about?

Mr. HILBORN. That is all provided for in the first section of the bill, in the pay of the Navy. It does not come in here. It is all right.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as far as the paragraph beginning—

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that we have reached the item in the bill now relating to the increase of the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested by a number of gentlemen that as it is nearly 5 o'clock it is rather late for any general debate. I think it would be better for the committee to rise, and if that will be satisfactory to those gentlemen who desire to speak, I will move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the announcement of the vote, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STROWD of North Carolina, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia, for this day.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 732) to regulate the issue and recording of the commissions of officers in several of the Departments;

A bill (H. R. 4463) to grant certain condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Thirteenth and Forty-third Separate Companies National Guard of State of New York; and Joint resolution (S. R. 75) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

The motion of Mr. BOUTELLE was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules of claims allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Bartley Harris against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an agreement with the San Carlos Reservation Indians ceding certain lands to the United States, together with reports from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the draft of a bill ratifying and confirming the agreement—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3124) to amend section 34 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 935); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4974) for the relief of settlers on the Northern Pacific Railroad indemnity lands, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 946); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DRAPER, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3014) revising and amending the statutes relating to patents, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 940); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. STALLINGS, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 2231) for the relief of Bluford Reeder. (Report No. 936.)

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 6282) to increase the pension of Alexander McBride. (Report No. 937.)

By Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs:

The bill (H. R. 3503) to correct the military record of Elisha B. Bassett. (Report No. 945.)

The bill (H. R. 2412) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against George Alcott on the rolls of the War Department. (Report No. 938.)

By Mr. SNOVER, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 145) for the relief of J. J. Lints. (Report No. 939.)

By Mr. HALTERMAN, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 6900) increasing the pension of Mary T. Young. (Report No. 941.)

By Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 5425) to grant a pension to Charlotte O. Van Cleve, widow of Gen. Horatio P. Van Cleve. (Report No. 942.)

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 4875) granting a pension to John W. Pogue. (Report No. 943.)

By Mr. ANDREWS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 7240) granting a pension to John W. Bruner, late of Company F, Second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and Company G, First Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, and the United States Signal Corps. (Report No. 944.)

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 7569) authorizing the issue of patents to the Swan Creek and Black River Chippewas and the Munsee or Christian Indians of Kansas, and for the sale of their reservation in Kansas, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. KYLE: A bill (H. R. 7570) for preliminary survey of Coldwater River, Mississippi—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. HULING: A bill (H. R. 7571) fixing the time for holding the circuit and district courts in the district of West Virginia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MILLIKEN: A bill (H. R. 7572) providing for the adjudication of pension claims in cases of hernia—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CRUMP: A bill (H. R. 7573) for the erection of a public building at Alpena, Mich.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: A bill (H. R. 7574) for the relief of certain settlers in the State of Washington—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7575) for the relief of persons who have filed declarations of intention to enter desert lands—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. RUSK (by request): A bill (H. R. 7576) to incorporate the Columbia Subway Company—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. GARDNER: A bill (H. R. 7577) to incorporate the Washington Homeopathic Medical College and Hospital—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MURPHY of Arizona: A bill (H. R. 7578) granting the Flagstaff and Canyon Railroad Company right of way for railroad purposes through the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve, in northern Arizona—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. NEWLANDS: A bill (H. R. 7579) to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to a portion of the Pyramid Lake Reservation, in Nevada, and to the entire Walker River Reservation, in said State, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SAYERS (by request): A bill (H. R. 7580) to provide for testing devices for the coupling and uncoupling of railway cars, and for awarding a prize to the most meritorious of such devices—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 26, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

CLAIMS FOR BARRACKS AND QUARTERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 13, 1896, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to reexamine certain claims reported to Congress in House Executive Document No. 234, Fifty-third Congress, third session, a report from the Comptroller of the Treasury thereon, of the 24th instant; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 13, 1896, certain information relative to the Union Pacific, Central Branch Union Pacific, Sioux City and Pacific, and the Kansas Pacific railroad companies; also the number of acres of land granted to each and all the Pacific railroads; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 732) to regulate the issue and recording of the commissions of officers in several of the Departments;

A bill (H. R. 4463) to grant certain condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Thirteenth and Forty-third Separate Companies National Guard of State of New York; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 75) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Oklahoma Territory, praying for the establishment of an international board of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the American Anti-Saloon League, praying for the appointment of an impartial national commission of inquiry to investigate and report upon the alcoholic liquor traffic, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of the United Independent Political Club, of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURROWS presented the memorial of W. C. Fowler and 17 other citizens of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the petition of the Muskogee or Creek and Seminole Nations, signed by the chief, opposing the passage of certain measures pending before the Senate which have been presented in consequence, as they assume, of the recommendation of the Dawes Commission. As the petition is from the nation, I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Petition of the Muskogee or Creek and Seminole Nations.

To the Congress of the United States:

The Muskogee or Creek and Seminole Nations, by their duly authorized representatives, do hereby most respectfully petition your honorable body to take such action as will prevent the passage of the measures now pending before you, which are calculated and intended to destroy our local governments, to deprive us of the right of self-government, to rob us of our heritage, and to abolish and annihilate our tribal existence.

We desire respectfully to call your attention to the fact that under the solemn treaty stipulations the right of unrestricted self-government has been guaranteed to our people.

You have recognized and respected that guaranty for many years, and under it we have established and maintained local governments in form similar to your own. Our people have advanced in all the arts of civilization, churches have been established, and a system of common schools has been maintained, and provision for the liberal education of our youth has been provided, and all branches of industry have been promoted. We point with proud satisfaction to the influence of these instrumentalities as tending to Christianize, educate, and elevate our people and fit them for the higher duties and responsibilities which should characterize freemen and patriotic citizens.

Under this system of government our people are making commendable and satisfactory progress, and their pride and ambition are stimulated to increased efforts for higher and greater achievements.

While we do not pretend that our governments are perfect either in form or in the methods of administration—because we realize that no human governments are perfect—still we invite the closest scrutiny into all our local concerns, and particularly as to the protection of the rights of persons and property within our limits. We challenge the most searching investigation into all our affairs, feeling assured that as a result of such investigation our people will receive full and complete vindication.

If at any time the rate of crime in our country has exceeded that of the States of the Union, it has resulted from the fact that a large number of those who belong to the criminal classes have invaded our territory from adjacent States, in violation not only of our laws but of the laws of the United States.

It is our desire especially to enter our solemn protest against those statements contained in the report of the Dawes Commission, which charge crime, corruption, and misrule among our people, and we challenge the most searching investigation by a committee of honest, impartial, and fair men into the condition of our people, the manner in which our laws are administered, and the provision we have made for the protection of the lives and property of those who may reside among us.

We are prepared to say for our people that upon such a report, coming from such a source, they will be willing to stand and to abide for all the purposes of future action in regard to them.

But we do most solemnly protest against the enactment of any legislation predicated upon the report of the Dawes Commission which will effect the autonomy of our governments.

In all our public and domestic affairs we have sought to pattern after your form of government and liberal institutions, and to emulate the Christian civilization of your intelligent and patriotic people. If we have fallen below the highest standards, illustrated by your superior intelligence and advanced civilization, it may be possible that you are in part responsible, as the invasion of our territory by criminals and covetous land grabbers has disturbed the peace of our country and injured the good reputation of our law-abiding and peaceable people.

In the name of sacred treaty stipulations, in the name of statutory provisions which you have enacted for our protection, in the name of the decisions of your judicial tribunals, and in the name of national honor, we appeal most earnestly to you, the representatives of this great Christian nation, to spare our homes, our firesides, our institutions, and our inestimable heritage, and let us alone until such time as we have under the inspiration of Divine Providence—encouraged by the example of you rliberal institutions and superior civilization—worked out our own welfare and destiny.

Very respectfully submitted.

G. A. ALEXANDER,
S. B. CALLAHAN,
E. B. CHILDERES,
D. V. ANDERSON,
Delegates for the Creek Nation.
HULBUTTA MEKKO,
JOHN JUMPER,
Delegates for the Seminole Nation.
SAMUEL H. MILLER, Interpreter.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the petition be also printed as a document, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRAY presented a petition of the Wilmington Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Wilmington, Del., praying for the adoption of a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Petition of the Wilmington Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church to the Congress of the United States.

Whereas the Constitution of the United States contains no recognition of God or of His providence; and

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a joint resolution proposing the following amendment:

"We, the people of the United States, devoutly acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations, and the revealed will of God as of supreme authority in civil affairs, in order to form a more perfect Union," etc.; and

Whereas the proposed amendment, if adopted by constitutional majorities by Congress and the State legislatures, would change our organic law from a purely secular to a theocratic Government, which was not intended by the framers of the Constitution or any of the States ratifying the same; and

Whereas no Unitarian, Jew, or Deist, who nevertheless might be a patriotic and useful citizen, could conscientiously swear to support the Constitution containing the said amendment: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by this conference with instructions to proceed to Washington as soon as possible after the adjournment of this body in order to lay before Congress the following petition:

"The members of the Wilmington Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, now sitting at Dover, in the State of Delaware, respectfully petition the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, to pass a joint resolution submitting to all the State legislatures for ratification the following amendment to the Constitution:

"After the word 'posterity,' in the preamble as it now stands, insert the words 'trusting in Almighty God,' so that the whole preamble thus amended shall read as follows: 'We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, trusting in Almighty God, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Resolved secondly, That the said committee secure, if possible, a similar petition from the Lay Electoral Conference, and that our delegates to the next General Conference endeavor to secure a like petition from that body.

Respectfully submitted.

J. H. Caldwell, R. H. Adams, W. L. S. Murray, Vaughn S. Collins, E. C. Macnichol, George A. Phoebus, Thomas E. Terry, T. E. Martindale, Merritt Holburd, Lewis E. Barrett, Edward Davis, W. E. Avery, Alfred T. Scott, F. C. MacSorley, John D. Rigg, C. W. Prettyman, R. Irving Watkins, B. F. Price, Henry S. Thompson, Charles A. Hill, Robert W. Todd, J. B. Quigg, Charles F. Sheppard.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1886, or some similar measure, requiring the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to adopt rapid transit on its lines, and remonstrating against the extension of the tracks of that company until its existing lines are modernly equipped and operated; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of Lansing City Lodge, No. 384, International Association of Machinists, of Lansing, Mich., and a petition of Gratiot Lodge, No. 117, International Association of Machinists, of Port Huron, Mich., praying for an investigation of the treatment accorded workingmen in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Navy-Yard and other navy-yards of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the National Association of Stationary Engineers, No. 11, of Negaunee, Mich,, praying for the passage of the so-called Squire bill, relative to naval engineers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of the Illinois Reform Press Association, of Springfield, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Lodge bill appropriating $88,000,000 to carry out a scheme of coast and harbor defenses; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Advance, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation giving second-class mail matter, such as religious tracts, full advantage of the act of July 16, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of La Clede, Ill., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Illinois general assembly, praying for the enactment of legislation providing a general system of dock and harbor improvements upon the Great Lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Joseph Sherwood, George Caswell, Harmon Varrell, and Charles M. Powell, enlisted men of the U. S. S. Bibb, and citizens of Maine, praying for the enactment of legislation placing them under the provisions of the acts of Congress of July 14, 1862, and of June 27, 1890, granting pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALTHALL presented a concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of Mississippi, praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas property belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in Nashville, Tenn., was used, damaged, and destroyed, under the direction of the United States Army, during the war; and

Whereas the policy of the Federal Government has ever been to compensate peaceable citizens within the borders of our country for property used, damaged, or destroyed, belonging to private individuals or concerns, under the authority or direction of the Federal Army; and

Whereas several committees in Congress have pronounced valid the claims made by the agents of the Methodist Church South for compensation for the use of property by the United States Army during the late war: Therefore

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Mississippi are hereby formally and earnestly requested to use every honorable effort to secure the passage of a bill now pending in Congress for the "relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South."

That a copy of these preambles and resolutions be certified by the secretary of state and sent our members of the House and Senate of Congress.

Adopted by the house February 21, 1896.

FRANK A. CRITZ,
Speaker pro tempore of the House.

Adopted by the senate February 24, 1896.

J. H. JONES,
President of the Senate.

Approved March 11, 1896.

A. J. MCLAURIN, Governor.
J. L. POWER, Secretary of State.

Mr. BRICE. I present a memorial of the agents of the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania, relative to the claims of these States, under the act of July 27, 1861, as stated in Senate Document No. 75, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session. I move that the memorial be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Connecticut, praying for the establishment of an international board of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition of the Paint, Oil, and Varnish Club, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the establishment of a department of commerce and manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BERNARD R. GREEN.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress to report a joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its passage.

The joint resolution (S. R. 114) authorizing and directing Bernard R. Green to exercise the duties and powers heretofore conferred upon the late Gen. Thomas L. Casey in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Bernard R. Green be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to assume and exercise all of the duties and powers heretofore conferred by law upon the late Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Casey, in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress, and he shall receive as compensation for his services the sum of $5,000 per annum, payable out of the appropriations for said Library building: Provided, That all expenses incurred in the prosecuting of said work, including compensation of employees, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely wish to say that Mr. Green is the man who has been the engineer under General Casey in the construction of a considerable share of the War, State, and Navy Department building, the Washington Monument, and the Library building, at present nearing completion. This building, it is expected, will be completed within less than one year from the present time. It is only recently that General Casey said to me that Mr. Green, receiving only $4,200 a year as his compensation, is really worth $5,000; and therefore the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress have placed his future compensation at the rate of $5,000 a year. I trust that the joint resolution will receive the unanimous approval of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I most cordially second the proposition of the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. Since the Committee on Appropriations took this matter largely in hand and have from year to year examined into all of the appropriations for the new Library building, I think I may speak for all the committee in saying that the worth of the services of Mr. Green has been constantly growing in the mind of the members of the committee. He is a man of singularly excellent capacity, of untiring industry, of great integrity; and in the calamity that has fallen upon the country in this service and in other ways in the death of General Casey, I esteem it a matter of great congratulation to ourselves that so good a successor is naturally presented in the great work in which General Casey, was engaged. I would be willing to increase the compensation. If at any time hereafter the amount proposed in the joint resolution is not large enough, I shall be even willing to increase the compensation provided in the joint resolution for this most excellent and worthy man.

I wish to say further, although it is needless here, that long experience with General Casey has led me to estimate him as one of the best of all officers in the public service. The monuments that his genius has raised in this city will be enduring as memorials to his fame, and all that has been done by Congress for him is only a slight measure of recognition of his real merit.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I can not let the occasion pass without adding a word in respect to the peculiar merit of Colonel Green for this appointment. His connection with the construction of the Library building began during the time while I was upon the commission originally created, composed of the Architect of the Capitol, the Librarian of Congress, and the Secretary of the Interior. He was from the outset of the work the efficient accomplishing force connected with it, and he always has been from that time to this. He has been retained from no favor. I do not think there is a man in the United States who is his superior in knowledge of everything that pertains to the construction of a building in every branch, both of the substantial material parts, and of the æsthetic parts. I believe that the Government of the United States has saved a very large sum of money in the construction of the Library building by reason of Mr. Green's capacity and fidelity.

It is a pleasure to me to support the joint resolution, while at the same time I join in lamentation at the loss of the excellent officer who has been called away.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am always reluctant to assent to resolutions of this character, which are brought in without a report from any committee and upon which immediate action is desired. I should suppose the selection of an important official like this is a matter that might well be referred to some appropriate standing committee of the body and then be reported to the Senate for action. I know nothing in regard to the qualifications of Mr. Green, or Colonel Green, I think he is called, nor in regard to the propriety of the compensation proposed to be given him. I shall ask this question: Is he connected with the Army in any way? Has he been?

Mr. VILAS. I do not understand that Mr. Green is an Army officer. He is a civil engineer, but had been in the employment of the Government, as was stated by the Senator from Vermont, as superintendent for a considerable portion of the time of the construction of the State, War, and Navy building, and afterwards of the construction of the Washington Monument, at the conclusion of which work he was employed as superintendent of the construction of the building for the Library of Congress.

Mr. HILL. Why should not the successor of General Casey, whoever he may be, take the place of General Casey and still retain this man as an assistant?

Mr. VILAS. I do not undertake to answer for the committee, the venerable chairman of which is present, but I will simply say, as the Senator directs his question to me, that this work is now and always must be peculiarly and specially in the hands of Mr. Green, and as it is now so near completion, it could do no good and might do harm to change its superintendence.

Mr. HILL. General Casey was appointed or selected or detailed for this position, I presume, by some statute. It does not follow, I suppose, that his ordinary army duties would have given him this position.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Maine explain in regard to that matter?

Mr. HALE. I will tell the Senator exactly how it came about. The plans and the work for the new building dragged for a long time, until at last, when applications were made for appropriations to commence the real work and to furnish real plans and were laid before the Committee on Appropriations, that committee, with the knowledge that it had of General Casey in regard to his adaptability for this kind of work, as shown in the State, War, and Navy Department building and in the finishing of the Washington Monument, sent for General Casey. It was not, I will say to the Senator from New York, because he was an army officer, but because of the acquaintance that Congress had with him in connection with these great works, the skill that he had developed, and his large, broad capacity. The whole subject was laid before General Casey, and he was requested to formulate some plan which his experience, not technically as an army officer, but in the building of great structures, would induce him to do. When he laid his plan before the committee it was so complete in every detail that the whole work was imposed upon him, and from that day to this it has been a constant source of satisfaction, I think, to the committee that that was done.

Now, he was not selected simply as an army officer, but because of his great experience, and in that experience, I will say to the Senator, Mr. Green traveled alongside with him as his assistant. He was at once taken by General Casey and put practically in charge, and since then he has developed the faculty and the ability that show him to be much more competent for the service than any army officer is likely to be.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I do not like legislating a man into office. That is all this bill is. I think it would be wiser, if the original act does not provide for the appointment by some board, or by the President or Secretary of War, that a statute should be passed by which an appointment can be made. I will ask the Senator from Maine, who seems to understand this matter better than I do, how General Casey was originally appointed, whether by statute specially or by some authority?

Mr. MORRILL. By law, as the Chief Engineer of the War Department, and subsequently, when he was about to retire, he was continued under the name of General Casey until the building should be completed.

Mr. HILL. Then why should not his successor succeed him and have the same charge?

Mr. HALE. He has had no such experience as General Casey had in this kind of work.

Mr. HILL. Not in this particular work, but it is to be assumed he has had some experience.

Mr. HALE. This man has been practically in charge of the work from the day when the first stone was laid, constantly increasing in his usefulness, and no army officer can compete for a moment with him.

Mr. HILL. Why can not he continue in the same position under the new official as under General Casey, if he is so valuable a man?

Mr. HALE. I would reward a man for real merit and for the work he has done, and I would promote him because of that work.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from New York allow me?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state that this matter has been fully considered by every member of the committee, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], the chairman of the committee, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

Mr. HILL. When was the joint resolution introduced?

Mr. MORRILL. It has been considered by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the joint resolution was prepared under his supervision as the proper thing to be done.

Mr. HILL. I did not understand that a report from any committee was presented.

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly. The joint resolution is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. HILL. It is a report?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I want to appeal, as a Senator who likewise knows but little on this subject, to the Senator from New York to permit the joint resolution to be passed. If experience had not so often proved the contrary we would all have said that General Casey's place could never be filled. If it is possible that the work which he has so grandly carried on can be consummated, we are informed by this committee that it may be done by the gentleman whose name is stated in the joint resolution.

Mr. President, the splendid structure which for all ages—we hope as long as this Republic lasts—will adorn this capital has arisen through the efforts of the committee under the direction of the venerable and beloved senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. He has kept it from its inception until now out of all political controversy, out of every question except that which would tend to the beauty and grandeur of the building. We have known as little as he has seen fit to tell us. We have kept out of disputes about it and out of controversy as to whom the work should be awarded or under whose direction certain elements of its construction should be carried on, until now there is nearing completion the grandest and most beautiful library building that the whole world affords.

If the venerable Senator from Vermont, whose days and nights and constant thought have been given to the completion of this structure, is of opinion that it should be finished under the direction of the gentleman named in the joint resolution, I appeal to the Senator from New York to withdraw any opposition he may have based upon the fact that precedents do not call for this action, and to permit the joint resolution to pass and permit the structure to be finished under the same hands as those that inaugurated it. Long after the Senator from Vermont and all the rest of us shall have passed away that building will stand as a monument to his intelligence and his efforts and his patriotism, and for one I am delighted that it should be left in his hands.

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg to recall to the Senator from Vermont a fact which I think must have escaped his attention. When General Casey was placed in charge of the work upon the new Library building it was not as an officer of engineers, it was not as Chief of Engineers, but he was placed in charge of the work as Thomas L. Casey, by name, in a statute passed by Congress. It was done on account of his experience. The Senator from Maryland [Mr.

GORMAN] shakes his head. I am sure I am right, because I remember the circumstances very well.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator will find he was first employed as Chief of Engineers.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; he was not.

Mr. MORRILL. I know he was subsequently named.

Mr. ALDRICH. I remember very well talking the matter over with the late Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Beck, who had charge of this matter in the Committee on Appropriations. He insisted that if the work was to go on it should be under the charge of General Casey; and it was given him in charge, not as an officer of engineers, but as an individual. I understand the action now suggested by the Senator from Vermont is to follow the precedent which was made in this case, and which proved of great advantage to the country, and to appoint his successor in the same way.

Mr. HILL. What year was that statute passed?

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. This statute respecting General Casey was passed eight or nine years ago. It was perfectly familiar to every member of the Committee on Appropriations at that time. There was then a careful investigation made by that committee as respects the progress which had then been made in the construction of the Library building. There was practically no progress at all. With considerable appropriations every year for clerical and other force, they did not seem to be advancing the work. It was then that the Committee on Appropriations was called upon to make a large appropriation for the commencement of the structure, and we made such an investigation as led the committee to believe that if it was constructed under the management of those having it in hand its completion would be indefinite as to time and that it would cost an immense sum of money. The Committee on Appropriations having charge of the sundry civil appropriation bill, of which I was then chairman, my colleague the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] being upon the committee, and Senator Beck being also a member of the committee, made a full investigation of the subject. We then sent for General Casey and asked him to go over the plans and suggestions made by Mr. Smithmeyer, who was then the architect. He gave us an estimate as to what the probable cost ought to be, and also of the time necessary for its completion. The committee then considered the subject with care and again sent for General Casey, and stated to him that we had prepared an amendment which placed the whole charge of the work in his hands, fixing a limit of cost and fixing a time for its completion. He expressed a disinclination to take charge of the work, but agreed that he would do it if the amendment we proposed should pass and become a law and he could have a sufficient appropriation from year to year to execute it. His name was inserted in the bill as Gen. Thomas L. Casey, Chief of Engineers of the United States Army.

Mr. HILL. Can the Senator from Iowa turn to the act, or has any Senator here the act?

Mr. ALLISON. It was, I think, in the act of 1884, or probably in 1885. I will turn to the act presently. I can not at this moment remember the precise year.

Mr. VILAS. It was in 1888. The Senator is a little off on some of the other details in connection with the matter.

Mr. ALLISON. I may be, but I am not so far off as the Senator thinks I am, as will appear before I get through. The details are perfectly within my memory.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, I have the act here. The language of the original act, which remained in force until General Casey was retired, provided—

That the contracts for the construction of said building or any part thereof shall be made by the Chief of Engineers of the Army.

That language was followed until General Casey was retired.

Mr. ALLISON. His name may not have been mentioned until after his retirement, but it was no part of the duty of the Chief of Engineers of the Army to construct a Library building for Congress. Therefore it was as much a designation of Thomas L. Casey for that work as though his name had been originally inserted, which was my recollection. I apologize to the Senator from Wisconsin for making a mistake.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me, if General Casey had then died of course his successor would have taken charge of the work.

Mr. ALLISON. I will reach that point in a moment. This work was put in charge of General Casey, he being designated, of course, at first as Chief of Engineers. He went on with the work from year to year, and Congress appropriated whatever he asked to have appropriated for the work. When the time for his retirement arrived it became necessary—he being no longer Chief of Engineers of the Army—that his name should be inserted, and it was inserted.

During all this work, occupying eight or nine years, Mr. Green, who is now designated here, was his subordinate and had the chief control and direction of the details of the work. Being an engineer, he disclosed during this period a capacity for the work that met the complete approval of those familiar with it as it progressed.

The point I desire to impress upon the Senator from New York is, that the work has never been under any appointee. General Casey was not a Government appointee so far as this work is concerned. He was in the employ of the two Houses of Congress in the execution of appropriations made from year to year for the construction of the building. He never received a commission or a designation or an appointment in the form of an officer in charge of the work.

Mr. HALE. He was not detailed?

Mr. ALLISON. He was not detailed by the Department in any sense. The work from its inception to this moment, so far as respects General Casey, has not been in charge of any officer of the Government. It is not now in charge of any officer of the Government, because General Casey was not in charge as an officer. He was in charge as Thomas L. Casey, a retired officer, it is true, of the Army, performing a civil duty designated by Congress and not otherwise.

Mr. President, I speak without hesitation when I say that Mr. Green is eminently fitted for this work; first, from his education and qualifications as an engineer; secondly, from his assiduity; thirdly, from his integrity, and next from the fact that he is familiar with every stone and every brick and every piece of ornamentation in the Library building from its beginning to this time.

Mr. MORRILL. And he knows every workman.

Mr. ALLISON. And as the Senator from Vermont very properly suggests, he knows every workman. He is familiar with every contract and with every workman and with the qualifications of every workman, and there are men employed upon the Library building of the highest qualifications as respects their peculiar art. He is the only man of whom I know who is capable of completing this work as it ought to be completed. We have appropriated a sufficient amount of money for its completion. It will be completed within less time than one year. No new man, however intelligent he may be or however exalted he may be in office, can take up the thread of that work and be substituted intelligently for Mr. Green in its performance.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator before he sits down let me give the language of the act of 1892?

Mr. HILL. That is not the original act. The original act was in 1888.

Mr. HALE. I am speaking to the act of 1892, passed at the time of General Casey's retirement. After making the appropriation the act provided:

That Brig. Gen. Thomas Lincoln Casey, now in charge of the construction of said building, shall continue in said charge until its completion, whether on the active or retired list of the Army.

Mr. CULLOM. That was passed before his retirement?

Mr. HALE. Before his retirement.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, one word more and I am done. It is no reflection upon any chief engineer of the Army, or upon any engineer officer of the Army, that this designation shall go to the man who has had charge of the work as to its details. When General Casey retired he was placed in charge as General Casey, a retired officer, and not as an engineer officer. As there is no one now in charge of the building, I hope that the Senator from New York will yield and allow the joint resolution to pass, which will devolve the work upon Mr. Green as chief engineer and the superintendent of the work until it is completed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, when I rose to make the inquiry for information I labored under the impression that the joint resolution had not been introduced before, but had simply been introduced this morning, and I did regard and still regard it as somewhat hasty legislation. I am now advised that the joint resolution has been reported from a committee, although nothing had been referred to the committee. However, I recognize the right of a committee to report by bill or otherwise. I now understand that the joint resolution is reported from a committee and immediate action is asked.

The discussion has already shown how unreliable is the information of gentlemen who were very positive that when the original act was passed General Casey's name was mentioned in the act, not even in his official capacity, but as Thomas L. Casey, and they emphasized it. The original act I have before me. It was, as usual, an amendment to an appropriation act, an act of 1888. I will read the whole of the item:

For the building for the Library of Congress, as herein provided for, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, including the cost of all professional and other personal services that the Chief of Engineers of the Army may deem necessary for the work and shall specially order, $500,000.

This appropriation and all appropriations hereafter made, and all sums available from appropriations heretofore made for this purpose, shall be expended under the direction and supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, who shall have the control and management of all of said work and the employment of all persons connected therewith. And all contracts for the construction of said building, or any part thereof, shall be made by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and so much of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library," approved April 15, 1886, as requires the construction of said building substantially according to the plan submitted to the Joint Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress by John L. Smithmeyer, and so much of the first section as provides for a commission, together with the eighth section of said act be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and the duties of said commission under said act are hereby devolved upon the Chief of Engineers of the Army, who shall annually report to Congress at the commencement of each session a detailed statement of all the proceedings under the provisions of this act, and hereafter, until otherwise ordered by Congress, no work shall be done in the construction of said Library except such as is herein provided for, and all contracts for work or materials not necessary for the execution of the work contemplated herein are hereby rescinded.

So the gentlemen who answered that this work was originally given to Mr. Casey and not to the Chief Engineer of the Army are mistaken.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from New York will remember that I stated the matter as he finds it on the record.

Mr. HILL. I think the Senator from Vermont probably stated it accurately, though I did not hear the remark he made. Subsequently in 1892, in an appropriation act, as usual, it was provided—

That Brig. Gen. Thomas Lincoln Casey, now in charge of the construction of said building, shall continue in said charge until its completion, whether on the active or retired list of the Army.

I assume the idea of that enactment was because he was about retiring and there would be a question as to whether the language "Chief Engineer of the Army" would refer to a retired officer. I have no doubt that Congress intended to continue General Casey in charge. He selected Mr. Green. I have no objection to Mr. Green, who is undoubtedly a very competent man, but I do not quite see the hurry for the putting through of this joint resolution only a day or two after the death of this distinguished gentleman.

I am not disposed to continue my objection to the joint resolution if the committee have thoroughly considered this matter, although I do confess, while I shall not insist upon the objection, that I do not like this method of legislating, as I said, legislating a man into office by statute. It seems to me that either the President of the United States or some other authority might be designated to select a competent man. If we do not pass the joint resolution what is the result? The result simply is that in a few days the President will send in the name of some competent officer of the Army who is an engineer, and that engineer will succeed to the duties devolving upon him, and I assume will keep Mr. Green, if he is so valuable as has been represented, in this very same place.

The little increase of salary spoken of I care nothing about. That is a small matter. It strikes me, however, that it, designating a particular man, is not the proper way to legislate. If Mr. Green should die to-morrow Congress would have to pass another statute to meet the particular exigency. I do not like that way of legislating. The committee seems to be very earnest about the matter. They seem to think it is a matter requiring immediate action, even before the burial of the distinguished general. I do not like it, but I shall not insist upon my objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations at the time when this trust was created and this duty imposed upon General Casey. Whatever may be the language of the act, every member of the Senate at that time knew that this was a personal trust imposed upon General Casey as a man, that it in no wise pertained to the military duties which belonged to him as Chief of Engineers, but it was because, as stated at that time by the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Beck, as I well remember, that he had built the War and Navy portion of the State, War, and Navy building in a manner far superior to that which had been done under contract, and, as I now remember, at a cost one-third less than that at which the other portion of the building had been constructed. I remember that Mr. Beck was particularly earnest in his insistence that General Casey as an individual, as an architect, should have this duty imposed upon him. Therefore, whatever may be the language of the statute passed at that time, it was the intention of every member of this body—for there was no dissent, as I remember, to it—that this should be a duty imposed upon General Casey because of his personal qualifications and his capacity for the work.

I wish to say that General Casey was a model man. I knew him most intimately in his official duties and relations to the Library building. He was one of those rare geniuses who develop into great architectural ability and into great business ability in respect to details. He was one of those men who have built the great public buildings which have become classic and which in all parts of the world commemorate the most distinguished and eminent civilization in its architectural monuments. His place can not be supplied. He was a man of the century. His integrity, his complete and perfect devotion to models of art was something which is exceedingly rare and which, as I said before, belongs only to one man in a generation.

Mr. Green was General Casey's pupil and was familiar with all his methods. It is my good fortune to know him and know him somewhat well. I desire to bear my testimony here to the fact that he is one of the most eminent of the architects of this age, and he will develop, if opportunity is offered to him, a reputation which will equal that of the illustrious gentleman who has just passed away.

General Casey was a noble specimen of a man, and I am glad to be able to pay this tribute to him here. He would have been an honor to any country, to any age. Mr. Beck, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, long ago discovered his capacity, his great architectural ability, and it was largely, if I remember aright, through his efforts that General Casey was placed in charge of the construction of the War and Navy part of the State, War, and Navy building, and when all was in doubt and it was supposed extravagant expenditures had been made, and that $12,000,000 or perhaps $15,000,000 would not cover the cost of completing the Library building according to the architect's plan, General Casey, having examined into it, reported that he would do it for, I think, $6,000,000, and that he would do it within the time specified in his estimate.

A short time ago he informed me that he would not only complete the building within the time and in a manner which would be an ornament to this country and a distinguished monument to architectural art, but that he would do it within the estimate, and he insisted that that would be done. I have no doubt that had his life been spared that would have occurred.

I hope that we shall pass the joint resolution without opposition.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I should be very reluctant indeed to take away from a bureau of the War Department any work which properly belongs there, and I should be especially reluctant to do anything which would in any way reflect upon the present very able head of the Engineer Corps of the Army. I consider him the peer of any man who has held that position in my acquaintance. His selection as president of the Society of American Engineers shows how he is esteemed by the great railroad and civilian engineers of the country. But this is outside of the proper work of that Department. I do not believe that General Craighill seeks it or desires it in the least.

I have known Mr. Green and his work for many years—his work on the Washington Monument, his work on the War Department building and the Soldiers' Home, and upon the Congressional Library building. While in the Department I knew, of course, intimately all his methods in detail. I am glad to say, with some experience in construction, that I have never in my life known a man whom I considered his equal in work of this kind. He performed it so well that there was nothing left for his superior to do. I believe he has saved the Government hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars.

I think the joint resolution is only a very slight acknowledgment of the great debt the country owes him.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and my distinguished friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who is temporarily absent, have devoted many years of their Congressional life to bringing about the passage of an act for the construction of the grand pile which has been erected opposite this building. It was through their exertions, because of their efforts, that that grand pile has been erected. The architect, Mr. Smithmeyer, is entitled to great credit. He prepared the plans, which were adopted by Congress upon the recommendation of the Library Committee. The Library building will stand as a monument to his genius and his worth.

The work of construction was placed in the hands of General Casey as Chief of Engineers of the United States Army. In all the history of the Army I do not believe there is a single member of the Engineer Corps who has had the unbounded confidence of Congress and of the committees who have looked into his work as had General Casey. He was a man of supreme integrity and of splendid ability as an engineer and as an executive officer. There have been few in my time, if any, who were his equals. He has at last completed this work. All or nearly all of the contracts have been made under his direction. The decorations and every appointment of that great building have been under his eye and under his direction, Now that he has passed beyond, as a matter of course Congress must take prompt action to provide his successor to carry out that work. I accord to Mr. Green all that has been said of him. I suppose that under the peculiar circumstances of the case it is the wisest and best thing to place the finishing of the structure in his hands. But in doing so I do not want to make a precedent which will trouble us hereafter.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask where Mr. Green is from?

Mr. GORMAN. I have no idea of what State he is a resident. He is an American citizen and a civil engineer. My impression is that he is from New England.

Mr. HILL. There are a thousand American civil engineers, but I thought some one might know from what State this gentleman came or what building he has ever erected.

Mr. GORMAN. My impression is that he is a New England man, although I do not know from what State he comes. Mr. Green is a civilian, and to place by resolution in the hands of any civilian the expenditure of six or eight million dollars without any provision in regard to bond or supervision is unwise.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to state that there is a clause in the joint resolution providing that all of the expenses for compensation or under contracts shall be disbursed by the Treasury Department?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; but I understand all the authority which was conferred upon General Casey goes to Mr. Green, and that involves all the contracts.

Mr. MORRILL. I think he has given bond already.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not believe that there is in this case any danger. I know by the statements of General Casey and the officers connected with the Treasury Department that they regard this gentleman as a man of great integrity and great ability. I merely want to say that in voting for the joint resolution I consider it an exceptional case. I would not like to see it followed out hereafter, so that Congress by resolution would place in the hands of any civilian large expenditures without making proper provision as to bond.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand the joint resolution, it does not place one dollar of money to be handled individually by this superintendent.

Mr. GORMAN. No; but there are contracts.

Mr. COCKRELL. The contracts, as we all know, are practically made and completed. There is very little to be contracted for. The building will be completed inside of a year from this time.

Now, this is a Congressional building. It is not a building for the benefit of the Government generally. Congress is the only power that ought to select the persons to superintend it, just as we ought to select our Secretary here and every other one to transact our business. The work is done by the joint action of Congress, and I think it is the right and only proper method for Congress to make the selection. It does not belong to the executive branch or any other branch of the Government.

Probably I never saw Mr. Green more than once in my life. I have no idea what State he is from. I did know something of General Casey. When I came here a number of years ago the State, War, and Navy building was not completed and was not occupied. The State Department was out Fourteenth street. There was much delay and much complaint about the slow progress that was made. At the instance of some one of the committees of Congress a change was made, and General Casey was placed in charge of the construction of that building. I have learned since that Mr. Green was then his assistant. I do not know about that, but I know that that building was put up very rapidly, to the entire satisfaction and to the great gratification of everybody, and it was completed within the time he estimated and within the limit of the appropriation. I remember another instance: When this city was about to suffer for water, and it was necessary to have an additional water supply, General Casey was called in and made his suggestions and the matter was placed in his charge, and in one season alone he placed in position the 4-foot water main, a magnificent work. The material was collected from all the foundries in the country. It was brought in here on every route of transportation that could bear it, because it was the only way that it could be assembled in one season and completed. That work was completed, extending from the water supply in Georgetown here on North Capitol street, and when the water was turned on there was not a drop that leaked and there was not an imperfection found in it.

We all remember how the Library building was progressing. Everybody practically became disgusted with the slowness with which the work was being done. There were vague rumors about what the cost would be and the length of time it would take. The House of Representatives at that time, as we all know who were here then, instituted a rigid investigation. Its committee called before it those engaged in the construction, and they were so dissatisfied that they called upon General Casey to make a modification of the plan and an estimate of the amount it would cost and the length of time it would take to complete it. That estimate was made, the plans were submitted, and the House of Representatives adopted it, and directed that General Casey, then Chief of Engineers, not naming him, but putting it in his hands because he was the Chief of Engineers, should take charge of the work. We gave him authority to go on and construct the building according to his plan and specifications and authorized him to contract for the full amount. He went on and he had nearly brought the work to completion within the amount specified before his unfortunate and sad death.

Not an additional dollar has been required or will be required. He was continued in charge by name after he was retired because the description of Chief of Engineers would not suit him after that time. He would not be Chief of Engineers; he would be ex-chief.

Mr. Green, from what I am told, has very greatly aided General Casey in all this work, and I tell you the most wonderful work that has ever been done was the calculation of the cost of the Library building and the length of time it would take to construct it, when the material, the marble, had to be gathered from every noted quarry. You will find marble there from every State in the Union where there was any marble; and how anyone could make a calculation of what the cost would be is to me incomprehensible. I think that Mr. Green ought to be continued until the work is finished. The money is being paid out by the Secretary of the Treasury, and it will only be paid out in accordance with the existing contracts, which are nearing completion.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I feel that I ought to say one word in favor of the joint resolution, as I am one of the committee and believe that such a measure ought to pass. I shall not take up the time of the Senate by going over the history of the work that has been carried on here for a number of years, but I desire to say, what perhaps has already been said, that the work will be completed within the cost estimated and within the time specified when it was first begun. The last time that I had the pleasure of seeing the late General Casey he seemed to be exceedingly happy in talking about the work, and he said he expected to complete the building in January next, I believe, which was a month or two before the time should expire within which the work was to have been done, and he expected to save about $60,000 below the contract that had been made for the completion of the work at the beginning.

So far as Mr. Green is concerned, I have known him ever since he has been engaged in that work. He has seemed to be the active, constant man in charge of the work, of course subject to the supervision of General Casey, but he is largely responsible for the rapid progress of the work and for the manner in which it has been carried on. So far as the question of the impropriety of the appointment of a civil engineer by Congress to take charge of such a work and appoint him by name, it seems to me that this is a very noted case and a case where such an exception should be made. He has been engaged in this work from the beginning. The work is within a few months of completion, unless it is interfered with in some way that we know nothing about at present. So far as the joint resolution is concerned, it does not provide that Mr. Green shall handle any money at all except his own salary. The joint resolution reads:

That Bernard R. Green be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to assume and exercise all of the duties and powers heretofore conferred by law upon the late Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Casey in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress, and he shall receive as compensation for his services the sum of $5,000 per annum, payable out of the appropriation for said Library building: Provided, That all expenses incurred in the prosecuting of said work, including compensation of employees, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Is it expected that the place which Mr. Green now holds as first assistant is to be supplied by the appointment of some one else?

Mr. CULLOM. It is not contemplated by the joint resolution, and I do not know that it would be necessary to supply it.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no necessity for it at all.

Mr. CULLOM. There is no necessity for it in my judgment, in view of the fact that the work is all let substantially now, contracts are made, and the only requirement is that somebody shall be at the head of the establishment and give it his personal attention, so that the contracts may be carried out as rapidly as possible and within their terms. I do not think anything further is necessary in the premises than the adoption of the joint resolution.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I judge from the tone of the discussion that there is no longer any doubt about the disposition of the Senate to do this very reasonable and proper thing and direct Mr. Green, who has been the efficient superintendent and manager of its construction, to perform the few remaining things which are to be done during the coming year to complete that noble building.

But I wish to make one or two observations to correct some mistakes of history which have fallen from the members of the Committee on Appropriations, the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], as well as the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], in respect to the circumstances under which General Casey was placed in charge of the work.

I happened to have something to do with it. There was no complaint at that time of the then tardy progress of the work. There had been an interruption during the year previous, lasting for a great many months, in consequence of a controversy that had arisen between Mr. Smithmeyer, who had been designated as architect, and the contractors who had to furnish cement for the first course—the bottom course of the building. The only thin which had been done under the commission, as it had been constituted previously to the time when I went upon it, was to condemn the ground and dig a trench around the outside of the wall. I went upon that commission on the 18th of January, 1888, by virtue of being then placed in possession of the office of Secretary of the Interior, and in February following for the first time the commission met, and the controversy over the cement, which had been raging for nearly a year, at least for six or eight months, was settled at that meeting. Shortly afterwards—and I had perhaps as much to do with it as any other member upon the commission—Mr. Green was employed as superintendent, and in April, as quickly as the spring would permit, the subfoundation of cement was laid, the next foundation above it was laid, and before this act of Congress was passed the basement walls were some feet above the ground in places, and the work was going on with great rapidity.

What occasioned the change was this: One day in the summer of 1888 I was called before the subcommittee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives, the subcommittee then being composed of the Hon. Samuel J. Randall, Hon. J. H. Forney, Hon. Mr. Ryan, of Kansas, and perhaps one or two others; but I remember those three gentlemen as particularly active. I was called there for the purpose of explaining some estimates that had been sent up by my predecessor in regard to the Department of the Interior. Nothing was said in respect to the Library of Congress until I called their attention to the erroneous manner, as I conceived it, in which appropriations were being made for that building, which, after being discussed, led to an inquiry of me by the Hon. Mr. Randall: "What will the building cost, in your opinion?" I said, "From $7,000,000 upward, in my opinion, although I have no right to give one, for I am no builder." They exclaimed at once, every member of that subcommittee raising their hands and using vigorous speech, that it had been represented to them that if they consented to the construction of the Library of Congress building it should not cost to exceed $3,000,000. I said I was not aware of anything of the sort; that I meant to enter into no controversy, but that I would submit it to them as a mere general statement that that sum must be insufficient; that the Library of Congress building covers 23,000 square feet of ground more than the State, War, and Navy building, and the State, War, and Navy building had cost $11,000,000 or thereabouts, approximately.

Thereupon they declared that they would proceed no further with that work; it should be brought to the terms upon which it had been represented to them when they had consented to enter upon the scheme of building; and a discussion was begun at once in the House of Representatives, followed by an investigation, the result of which was this measure passed in the appropriation act of 1888, by which it will be seen that no plan was adopted then. They, in a certain vehemence of anger, struck down all plans, and simply directed the construction to be made by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, and the plan to be modified. There was a brief sketch of new plan suggested then, but the plans were to be modified. The act is dated October 2, 1888. It was then provided that the total cost of the building should not exceed $4,000,000, exclusive of the appropriations theretofore made.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me for a moment? Can he tell me when the work was first begun?

Mr. VILAS. The act for the creation of the Library commission, the original provision, was made in the Forty-eighth Congress, and in the last session, if I remember rightly, of the Forty-eighth Congress, probably on the 3d of March, 1885.

Mr. HILL. When was Mr. Green first connected with the work?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. Green was appointed in March or April, 1888, according to my best remembrance, and then the first stone was laid in the building by the contractors, who had been in quarrel with the architect in respect to the question of cement for many months, perhaps nearly or quite a year previous. I will not say Mr. Green was appointed superintendent before the contractors began on the work, but it was early.

Mr. HILL. He was not selected by General Casey; another inaccuracy.

Mr. VILAS. I suppose I appointed Mr. Green, together with the other members of the commission.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Green was there in the spring of 1888, and the appropriation bill containing this item did not become a law until October 2, 1888.

Mr. VILAS. The building was well advanced in construction when that act was passed, and because of that fact General Casey did not change the plan. The building is constructed to-day substantially and mainly upon the original plan, the plan as made by Mr. Smithmeyer, with very slight modifications. What General Casey did was this: He took out some of the cross sections of the interior building originally designed in the first Smithmeyer plan, and thus reduced the cost. The building is now simply a square, with two transverse segments passing through what would be the interior square or court. In the original design there were other transverse buildings, and by removing those he both improved the light of the interior and reduced the cost; and before General Casey did any work at all on the building Congress recognized that the original plan ought to be followed as so modified; and accordingly, the following March, before any work was done, the other act being passed in October (no work had been done during the winter), they changed the limit of cost to the sum of $5,500,000, exclusive of other appropriations theretofore made, which carried the total amount to some six million and three hundred or four hundred thousand dollars. Within that limit the building has been constructed. I believe it has been constructed with good judgment and with more economy than any other building that I ever knew the Government to have anything to do with. Mr. Green, as well as General Casey, is entitled to share the credit.

Mr. HILL. I notice that the act of 1888, at the end, says:

Provided further, That the total cost of said building shall not exceed $4,000,000, exclusive of appropriations heretofore made.

Was that changed afterwards to $5,000,000?

Mr. VILAS. That was changed within just five months. Five months afterwards it was changed before any work had been begun under it, and the old plan of the building was readopted with those modifications, by which the cost of it was somewhat reduced. The building, if constructed according to the plan which Congress had adopted and the Library Commission were at work under, would have cost probably $7,000,000 and more, but by taking out those transverse interior wings the cost was reduced.

Now, Mr. President, I only desire to say in reference to that, in justice to the Commission of which I was then a member and partly in claim of justice to myself, that there was no sort of criticism upon the rapidity of the work or the manner in which it was being conducted at the time when the act was changed. The whole controversy arose out of the fact that the other House found that the building was to cost more than it was expected and had been represented to them it would cost, and if Senators will look at the debates that took place in the House of Representatives at that time it will be found that that was the whole burden of complaint and controversy.

Mr. ALLISON. Both the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] animadvert upon the fact that I made a slight mistake. I said that originally General Casey's name was inserted in the law. That, for the moment, was my recollection, knowing that it was inserted in the appropriation act for several years. However, I regard that criticism as sticking in the bark and not touching the essential point that we are considering here. It would require a casuist to discover that the designation of the Chief of Engineers to do a work not within his province as Chief of Engineers was a different thing from inserting the words "General Casey, Chief of Engineers." Of course I accept the criticism of the Senator from New York with a proper degree of humility.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Iowa proceeds I should like to ask him a question, which perhaps is not very important. Was not this thing settled, whatever was done in the beginning, when General Casey retired? Was not the continuance by act of Congress of the work by him a determination of Congress that it was an individual trust and not one pertaining to the office of Chief of Engineers?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course the insertion of his name later was a necessary execution of what was originally done by the two Houses.

Mr. HOAR. My proposition is——

Mr. ALLISON. I understand, that it was a distinct averment——

Mr. HOAR. My proposition is that when General Casey retired Congress had to consider the question whether they had intended to intrust this work to him as an individual or had intended to annex it to the office of Chief of Engineers, and they enacted that it belonged to him as an individual when he retired from his office so far as the duties were concerned.

Mr. ALLISON. That is very true. When General Casey, as Chief of Engineers, was about to retire, Congress had freshly to consider the question, although originally, as every Senator who was here at that time knows, the placing of the Library building under the control of General Casey was done not because he was Chief of Engineers, but because of the knowledge of Congress as to his ability to perform the work.

Now, I did not enter into a detailed statement of what preceded the appointment of General Casey. Therefore, of course, my statement was not a full one as to the history of the construction. Of course I knew, as we all know, that the Library building was under the care of a commission prior to the statute of 1888.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] seems to think that there was no criticism as respects the method of conducting the work or its progress or its chief architect.

Mr. VILAS. Oh, no; not as to the latter.

Mr. ALLISON. It is well known that although Mr. Smithmeyer made an elaborate plan for the Library building, associated with him was another architect, Mr. Pelz, who has been constantly employed since that time; and it is well known from Mr. Smithmeyer's own statement, which he made to the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, that it was impossible for him even to estimate the cost of the building. He stated it might be eight, ten, or twelve million dollars, and he was the active officer in the construction of the building at that time, of course under the supervision of the Commission.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate inserted those provisions. They were not put in in the House. This question was wholly dealt with in the Senate as respects the selection of the Chief of Engineers of the Army for the work. We dealt with it in the Senate specifically. The amendment which has been twice read in this debate was prepared by Senator Beck and myself and submitted to General Casey, the House of Representatives having refused to make appropriations, because, as truthfully said by the Senator from Wisconsin, they were led to believe originally that the cost would not exceed $3,000,000. When we summoned General Casey before us and asked him to examine those plans, he stated that under those plans it would be impossible to construct the building for $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, and therefore we inserted the original provision in the Senate, my recollection is—I may be mistaken in that recollection—which I state with due deference to the Senator from New York who I hope will not criticise me adversely if I am mistaken. We had three or four conferences with a committee of the House before they would agree to progress with the building at all unless its cost was confined to $3,000,000, and unless a plan was projected that would limit the cost to $3,000,000. That is the truth about that matter. But it was finally agreed and compromised between our limit of cost to $5,000,000 and their insistance that the limit of cost should be $4,000,000.

Then it was that General Casey took all those plans, and within the intervening five months, as he was requested to do in the original act, modified the plan so as to make the limit of cost $5,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL. Six million dollars.

Mr. VILAS. A little over $6,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it was exactly $6,000,000.

Mr. VILAS. It was a little over $6,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. A little over $6,000,000. He then brought those modified plans to us and stated to us, that if he had proper legislation from year to year he would limit the cost to $6,000,000 and complete the work within eight years.

Now, that is the history of that transaction, given in brief, and I make no reflection upon the Commission or upon anyone who had charge of the matter, unless it be a reflection upon Mr. Smithmeyer to say that he was progressing with the work upon a scale of extravagance that was inexcusable. Therefore it was that we cut up by the roots in the appropriation everything respecting the chief architect. He insisted afterwards that because he was the chief architect he should have the compensation of a chief architect, which included a percentage upon the entire cost of the building, and we prepared in that amendment for any suit of damages against the Government of the United States, whether by Mr. Smithmeyer or any contractor, or under any contract that he had entered into. As the Senator from Wisconsin will see, we nullified the contracts which were then in existence, it being the intent and purpose of that legislation to place this whole matter in the hands of General Casey, and if it cost $30,000 or $50,000 in the way of damages to annul those contracts we intended that they should be annulled.

Afterwards Mr. Smithmeyer was settled with as architect and paid $30,000 for his services in the making of the original plan. I believe——

Mr. VILAS. Did he not recover a judgment for over $50,000 in the suit in the Court of Claims?

Mr. ALLISON. Was it $50,000?

Mr. VILAS. I think so.

Mr. ALLISON. My recollection is that it was $30,000; but whether it was $30,000 or $50,000 or $100,000 it was necessary that we should change the method of constructing the Library building, and it was done in the manner stated. I am not going into all those details. Then, for the first time in the history of the progress of the Library building, it went on steadily and constantly, Congress each year giving to General Casey the appropriations he estimated for.

Mr. President, I did not intend to go into this detail at all, and I have only gone into it for the purpose of showing that although I had made a slightly inaccurate statement, when we come to the core of this business the act of 1888 had for its intent and purpose the placing of the Library building in the hands of General Casey and not in the hands of any other officer of the Government.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Did the Senator state that it was the Senate which put the work under General Casey?

Mr. ALLISON. It was a Senate amendment.

Mr. VILAS. Was it not done in the other House?

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all. It was done in this body; it was done by the Appropriations Committee, and we had contest after contest with the House of Representatives.

Mr. VILAS. The House of Representatives originally put in the Secretary of the Interior alone, abolishing the Commission.

Mr. ALLISON. It did.

Mr. VILAS. And I addressed a letter to the committee, requesting that that should not be done and giving it as my judgment that it should not be imposed upon him.

Mr. ALLISON. I remember the letter of the Senator.

Mr. VILAS. I believe I urged the appointment of General Casey.

Mr. ALLISON. My recollection now is, and if I am mistaken I hope some one will see that my inaccuracy shall not be taken against me in this regard, that the Senator from Wisconsin, who was then Secretary of the Interior, appeared before the committee in the Senate and stated to us—it comes to my mind now—that it ought not to be put into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and declined to take charge of so important a work, saying that it was in the nature of things impossible for him to give it necessary attention as Secretary of the Interior. So the provisions as to the Library building were inserted in the Senate upon an amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, as I have described.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say just a word more in response to the Senator from New York. It is impossible by delay to provide that the President, or any Department of the Government, shall place a person in charge of the Library building by appointment. This is a Congressional library. It is a library belonging to the two Houses of Congress, as the library always has belonged to the two Houses. It is an expense as appropriate for us to make as for the clerks at the Secretary's desk, and it is our duty to provide for it in just such way as we provide for those officers. Instead of devolving these duties upon Mr. Green, I admit we may devolve them upon the Chief Engineer of the Army, or we can devolve them upon the Secretary of the Interior, or any other officer of the Government.

Whatever may have been the past history of this question, I think it is important that this action should be taken. The reason for the haste is, that although there are contracts made, and numerous contracts, there are a great number of people who are working upon the Library building day by day and people who are receiving compensation by the day, and large compensation is being paid for the decoration and ornamentation of the building. They have no authority to continue their work for a day or an hour unless we shall by some method devolve the control of the building upon some one. I have said a great deal more than I intended to say upon the subject. I hope the joint resolution will pass.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I desire to speak but a moment.

In common with all Senators, I was shocked at the sudden death of General Casey. I am filled with profound regret. This officer has passed away, at the end of an honorable career, with unblemished character and a high reputation for professional skill. The work which he has done in connection with the Washington Monument, the State, War, and Navy Department building, and the Congressional Library building will last forever to testify to his ability and fidelity.

Speaking now to the joint resolution before the Senate, praise is equally due for the character of General Casey's work in architecture to Mr. Bernard R. Green. I have known him for thirty years. I had the privilege, in connection with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], as a member of the Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, to recommend that Mr. Green be put in charge of the work upon the Congressional Library building. This recommendation, as the Senator from Vermont will remember, was made before it was determined that General Casey, then Chief of Engineers, should be placed in charge of the work. Mr. Green had been General Casey's assistant in the construction of the State, War, and Navy building, and in view of the complications which had arisen in reference to the construction of the Library building, which have been spoken of by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], it was thought by the Senate Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress that it would be a great help and a step in the right direction to have Mr. Bernard R. Green employed as an assistant architect in the construction of the building; and this recommendation was made anterior to the recommendation of the Senate committee that the work should be placed in charge of General Casey.

Mr. Green is a gentleman of great accomplishments in his line of work. He is modest and unassuming. He is a man of high personal integrity of character, and he has contributed largely to the success of General Casey's work of construction. General

Casey, like all other generals in command, is entitled to praise and commendation for what has been accomplished by his subordinates; but I know that General Casey himself would have paid the highest possible tribute to Mr. Green if an opportunity had been afforded. I am sure that the work can not be so wisely or so properly completed as it will be under the direction of Mr. Green upon the passage of the pending joint resolution.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, there have been some surprises in this debate. In the first place, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the remarks just submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] constitute a violation of an agreement made yesterday by him with the Senate. I regret that I feel constrained to call the attention of the Senate to it, but I do.

Yesterday the Senator from New Hampshire just before adjournment desired to offer an amendment to the appropriation bill then pending, and wanted it considered immediately. Some objection was made, and finally the Senator said that he wanted to expedite the business of the Senate to-morrow by going away, and immediately the Senator from Wisconsin said, "Everybody agrees to that." Instead of that, we find this morning the Senator here submitting remarks upon this joint resolution, to which nobody yet has specially objected. There were those who desired some information on the subject. I desired also to know where the distinguished gentleman, Mr. Green, resided, and we have been given the information that he resided in New England, and then the further astonishing information that he is a very modest man. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from New York allow me to reply to this important part of his argument now, because I am really going away shortly?

Mr. HILL. I will not detain you, then. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the contract I made with the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Illinois to go away, of which I have already been reminded by the Senator from Illinois this morning, did not specify any time. I said to-day, and I am going the latter part of the day. When a contract is made and no particular time is specified a reasonable time is allowed. The Senator from New York made a contract with his constituents when he was elected Senator that he would come down here and attend to the business of the Senate, but it was a year or more before he fulfilled that contract. He remained as governor of New York, and when it suited his convenience he came here; and we have been very glad to see the Senator here ever since he came. I will not say that we wish he had stayed away entirely, because he has afforded us much amusement and has benefited the public service on the whole. But I crave for myself the privilege of taking a day to comply with my contract, inasmuch as the Senator took a year for complying with a much more important contract.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for the implied compliment. He may or may not have made an express compliment. I did not know but that the Senator was going to say that he was sorry I came here. The Senator's contract that he made yesterday is about as uncertain and loose as this legislation, to which attention has been called. The Senator has not contributed anything to that portion of the debate. It was stated at the outset that it was intended to place this work in the charge of General Casey personally. I have already called attention to the fact that the original act provided that the work should be performed by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, in which General Casey was not mentioned at all. Next it was said that in 1892 it is very certain it was intended then to give the work to General Casey personally, and when we come to examine that provision, it reads as follows:

Provided, That Brig. Gen. Thomas Lincoln Casey, now in charge of the construction of said building, shall continue in said charge until its completion, whether on the active or retired list of the Army.

Mr. President, a man on the retired list of the Army is an officer of the Government, and this very section limited the time during the period that he should be an officer of the Government. If General Casey had resigned all connection with the Army, active or retired, he would have ceased to be an official of this Government, and he would have ceased to have had charge of this work.

It was then said, as a very high compliment to Mr. Green, that he was selected by General Casey originally, and then comes the Senator from Wisconsin, who seems to have had more to do with this matter than any other Senator, and properly so, and intelligently so, as appears from the statement made, and says that Mr. Green was on this work before General Casey was placed in charge of it. We get more light on the subject. Mr. Casey was placed in charge when, according to the Senator from Iowa, there was some criticism in regard to the work. The fact that Mr. Green was continued all this period by General Casey is of course to his credit and I agree to it, and so far as I am concerned I do not object, so long as the committee want it, that he shall be continued. If the Committee on Appropriations, in their haste to add general legislation to an appropriation bill, intended to place this work in charge of Mr. Casey personally, they succeeded in concealing their intention. It affords an argument appropriate to be made at this time that it was unwise then and is unwise now to place such important legislation hastily in an appropriation bill.

Now, if the chairman of the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress desires to pass the joint resolution, as I said at the outset, so far as I am concerned, I shall offer no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope we shall now have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 206) to provide an American register for the steamer Kahului, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2090) to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4698) so provide an American register for the steamer Matteawan, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 293) authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital, to report it with amendments, and submit a report thereon. I move that double the usual number of copies of the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3549) authorizing the Aransas Harbor Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Corpus Christi Channel, known as the Morris and Cummings Ship Channel, in Aransas County, Tex., reported it with amendments.

Mr. MANTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2564) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Blackfeet Reservation, Mont., and making appropriations to carry the same into effect, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2565) to ratify an agreement with the Indians of the Fort Belknap Reservation, Mont., and making appropriations to carry the same into effect, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5914) to amend an act to authorize the Interoceanic Railway Company to construct and operate railway, telegraph, and telephone lines through the Indian Territory, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred an amendment submitted by himself on the 16th instant, for the relief of Emmart, Dunbar & Co., intended to be proposed to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, reported it without amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 205) granting a pension to Mary O. H. Stoneman, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. LINDSAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1694) to increase the pension of Maj. Gen. Julius H. Stahel, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5083) granting an increase of pension to A. H. McLaws, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred an amendment submitted by himself on the 23d instant, for support and education of 250 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Santa Fe, N. Mex., intended to be proposed to the Indian appropriation bill, reported it without amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that it be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1885) for optional and compulsory retirement of Government employees of Executive Departments in the classified service, to submit an adverse report thereon, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, the Post-Office Department being only one of the numerous branches of the executive department to which the subject-matter of the bill refers.

The report was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WASHINGTON, PA.

Mr. QUAY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2629) to provide for the erection of a public building at Washington, Pa., to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices at Washington, Pa., the cost of the site and building, including the vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $75,000.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what is the population of the town of Washington?

Mr. QUAY. I think it has a population of about 10,000.

Mr. GRAY. It is a county town?

Mr. QUAY. Yes; a county town.

Mr. GRAY. Of what county?

Mr. QUAY. Washington County.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2635) granting a pension to Caroline Watkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2636) to establish a farmers' market in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2637) granting a pension to Jane Christian Marye; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S. 2638) granting a pension to Aaron W. Swick; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCMILLAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2639) to authorize the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company of the District of Columbia to change its motive power for the propulsion of its cars, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 2640) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for leave of absence for officers and employees in the customs service of the Government who receive per diem compensation," approved August 28, 1890; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CALL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 115) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FINANCIAL POLICY.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer a resolution, and ask to have it read and lie on the table.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Congress should, by appropriate legislation, and without further delay, restore silver to free and unlimited coinage at the ratio of 16 parts of standard silver to 1 part of standard gold, and should, by appropriate legislation, withdraw from the Secretary of the Treasury any power he may now have to issue the bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the United States until the necessity therefor shall have been declared by Congress, and that Congress should not adjourn until these things have been accomplished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

ACCEPTANCE OF MEDALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I reported yesterday from the Committee on Foreign Relations a joint resolution providing for the acceptance of medals by ex-President Harrison. I ask that it be now considered. It was laid over at the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. R. 111) to authorize Benjamin Harrison to accept certain medals presented to him while President of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. KYLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2284. It is a very short bill, and it will take only a moment to pass it. It is very important to the settlers upon the ceded lands in South Dakota.

Mr. CULLOM. If it will give rise to no debate, I shall have no objection.

Mr. KYLE. It will cause no debate. It has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2284) for the relief of homestead settlers in Gregory County, S. Dak.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in all cases, including those arising on ceded portions of Indian reservations where persons duly qualified to enter land under the homestead laws have heretofore or may hereafter settle, improve, and continuously reside upon unsurveyed public land with the bona fide intention of entering the same under the homestead laws when surveyed and opened to entry shall, upon presenting final proof, as required by law, be entitled to credit for residence, improvement, and cultivation made prior to the approval of such survey and the acceptance of filings. All acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. I wish that that amendment might be read again.

Mr. KYLE. I can state to the Senator in one word what it means. It merely provides that those upon the ceded lands who have been living upon them for a number of years as squatters, when the lands are thrown open to settlement or to entry, shall be allowed to count the time they have lived upon the lands with reference to their final proof. That is all.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. The bill started to relieve some settlers in a certain county in South Dakota. It has now a very wide application, and I think that I should like to have a little more time to consider whether it is wise to pass a bill so sweeping.

Mr. KYLE. I wish to state to the Senator from Connecticut——

Mr. PLATT. I shall object to it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. KYLE. I think the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw the objection when I explain the bill. The bill was drawn in the first instance for the relief of certain settlers in South Dakota. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] asked that it might be extended to his State. Then other members of the Committee on Public Lands thought that it might with justice be extended to other States where there are ceded lands. Thereupon the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], who has had much experience in the matter of public lands, drew the amendment exactly as it is now, and it received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

ADJUSTMENT OF CLAIMS WITH ARKANSAS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, that bill has been the unfinished business since the 2d day of March. It has been crowded out by the Cuban conference report and the privileged report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and appropriation bills until now. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow the bill which is the unfinished business shall be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the morning business, this bill shall be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. KYLE. I will let the bill which was under consideration at 2 o'clock go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM rose.

Mr. BERRY. Of course if the appropriation bill is not finished to-day I shall yield until it is disposed of.

Mr. CULLOM. I was going to say that I have no objection to the Senator's request so far as I am concerned, provided it does not interfere with the appropriation bill.

Mr. BERRY. I take it that the appropriation bill will be concluded to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think the Senator from Arkansas ought to ask at this time, in the thin condition of the Senate, unanimous consent for the consideration of the unfinished business to-morrow morning. I do not know that there is any objection to it, but I know that two Senators, who I suppose intend to discuss it and oppose it, are not at the present time in the Chamber.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator from Connecticut will permit me, I will state that when the bill was made the unfinished business the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] asked for time, and I gave him all the time he asked, which was until the 16th of the present month. Since that time I understand he has been ready at all times to proceed with the bill. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] also understood that I was to get it up to-day or to-morrow if it was possible for me to do so. He is going away, and he has no objection to it. I have been most patient in regard to the bill. I have given way to everyone. If the pending appropriation bill passes to-day, it is but fair that we should take this bill up to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the morning business, and I have no doubt but that we can reach a vote on it to-morrow. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will not interpose an objection.

Mr. PLATT. If the appropriation bill should be completed at 3 o'clock this afternoon the bill which the Senator from Arkansas has asked consideration for to-morrow morning would be in order, and we could take it up this afternoon and go on with it. If the appropriation bill is out of the way, his bill becomes the next business of the Senate, but I do not want to make any unanimous agreement concerning it.

Mr. CULLOM. My impression is that the appropriation bill will not take all of the day, but there will be another appropriation bill ready perhaps for to-morrow.

Mr. BERRY. A member of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], told me that an appropriation bill would be reported to-morrow, but as it would have to be printed it would not be ready for consideration, and that there would be no objection to the Senate taking up the Arkansas bill to-morrow morning and disposing of it. I simply state that I have given way to everyone and I have made no trouble about it, and I think we are entitled to a day for the consideration of this matter, in which is involved a settlement between one of the States of the Union and the Government of the United States. All that I ask is fair treatment in this matter. The bill has been the unfinished business since the 2d day of March.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Arkansas will allow me, I will state that my suggestion was intended for the benefit of the Senator. If we get the appropriation bill out of the way early we may pass his bill to-day.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator will not get the appropriation bill through by 3 o'clock. I am satisfied it will take all of to-day. But even if the appropriation bill should be out of the way at 3 o'clock, we could not conclude the consideration of the Arkansas bill this evening. We could do so to-morrow, but of course if the Senator from Connecticut objects that is the end of it; I shall have to take my chances.

Mr. PLATT. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill whenever it is reached, but I do not think it is wise to make a unanimous agreement in the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside without losing its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that will be the order of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

LAKE MICHIGAN AND WABASH RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask, in pursuance of the assent of the honorable Senator from Illinois, to take up the joint resolution S. R. 110, which relates to my State.

Mr. CULLOM. I consented yesterday morning to yield to the Senator from Indiana for the consideration of some little measure that he desires to have considered; but he failed to call my attention to it at the proper time, and I had forgotten it. I hope that the Senator from Indiana may be allowed to call up his joint resolution.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 110) providing for the appointment of a commission, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the preliminary survey, with plans, specifications, and approximate estimates of cost thereof, for the construction of a ship canal, of approved width and depth, from the lower shore of Lake Michigan to the Wabash River, and for the further investigation of the practicability of the construction of such waterway.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. When the Senate adjourned yesterday evening it had concluded the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole and the bill had been reported to the Senate. I now ask, as the first step, that the amendments made to the bill as in Committee of the Whole, of which there was not notice given of a desire to vote upon them separately in the Senate, be now concurred in in gross. Of course among the amendments reserved for a separate vote in the Senate are included the provisions relating to the compensation of district attorneys and marshals.

Mr. CALL. There are some amendments which have been distinctly reserved by me; one, the amendment striking out the provision in regard to certain State Department clerks; another, striking out the amendment in regard to the committees, and the amendment proposing to strike out certain provisions of the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the vote will now be taken on concurring in the other amendments in gross except those reserved, which include the provisions relating to district attorneys and marshals, in the latter part of the bill.

Mr. HILL. What is the necessity for that course?

Mr. CULLOM. If we went over the bill item by item we would be here all day concurring in the little amendments. The usual rule is by one vote to concur in all amendments made as in Committee of the Whole except as to those on which a separate vote is desired.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to know whether the amendment on page 19, relating to register of copyrights, was reserved?

Mr. CULLOM. It was not reserved, so far as I know. The Senator can reserve it if he desires.

Mr. KYLE. I desire to reserve that amendment for a separate vote.

Mr. CULLOM. Now I hope the vote will be taken on concurring in all amendments made as in Committee of the Whole which have not been reserved for a separate vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is uncertain whether the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] desired to reserve an amendment for a separate vote or not.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from New York has not indicated any such desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there be objection, the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be considered as concurred in, subject to the reservations which have been specified.

Mr. CULLOM. As to amendments which have been reserved, I hope Senators asking for a separate vote will now call the amendments to the attention of the Senate, so that they may be disposed of.

Mr. KYLE. Then I ask the attention of the Senator from Illinois to page 19, the amendment relating to copyrights. I do not think it is explicit as it reads. It is in this language:

> For register of copyrights, $2,000, who shall be selected by the Committee on the Library of the two Houses of Congress, shall give bond, shall have and exercise all the rights and duties touching copyrights now devolved upon the Librarian of Congress, and shall make weekly deposits and monthly reports to the Secretary of the Treasury; to be immediately available.

In line 9 I should like to add as an amendment the words "except the appointment of clerks," which I think clearly carries out the meaning of the member of the Committee on Appropriations who drafted the amendment. After the word "Congress," in line 11, I move to insert those words.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not see any objection to that amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will not hurt and it will not do any good. Let it go in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 11, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to insert "except the appointment of clerks"; so as to read:

> For register of copyrights, $2,000, who shall be selected by the Committee on the Library of the two Houses of Congress, shall give bond, shall have and exercise all the rights and duties touching copyrights now devolved upon the Librarian of Congress, except the appointment of clerks, and shall make weekly deposits and monthly reports to the Secretary of the Treasury; to be immediately available.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. PLATT. Have the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole been concurred in?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in, except those reserved.

Mr. PLATT. Except those reserved, of course.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] reserved two or three amendments, and I should like to have them now disposed of.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire a separate vote on the amendments beginning on page 22, line 21, going down to and including line 9, on page 23, in reference to the employees of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, disagreed to the committee amendment, which reads:

For services of employees of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department, to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude for the work of compiling and distributing consular and other commercial reports, namely, one clerk, at $1,400; one clerk, at $1,000; one clerk, at $900, and one laborer, at $660; in all, $3,960, the same to be paid from the appropriation of $20,000 for preparation, printing, publication, and distribution, by the Department of State, of the consular and other commercial reports, made in the diplomatic and consular appropriation act approved February 27, 1896.

This amendment was recommended and requested by the Secretary of State for a special work—that of editing and distributing the consular reports. I am informed that the special desire and object of the recommendation was to obtain persons who are competent for the editorial duty of preparing the consular reports in proper form for publication and also for their distribution. I am also informed that there has been an amount appropriated in a single sum, subject to the discretion of the Secretary of State, for this work for some years, and that such persons have been employed under that appropriation for this particular work. I think $20,000 has been appropriated for that purpose heretofore.

There is an act of Congress which forbids the employment of any person on a salary unless authorized by an act of Congress. The Secretary of State, as I am informed, having been in the habit of employing under this single sum of $20,000 persons for this special work, the Solicitor of the Treasury has decided that in his opinion it would come within the provision of the statute of the United States prohibiting the employment of any person upon a salary except under a special designation of an act of Congress. So this particular work, being paid for out of that appropriation, will be suspended and these clerks placed under the civil-service rules, without any provision, as I understand, for their payment except out of this appropriation. For that reason I am told that these clerks have been asked in this form, and it is no new provision in reference to clerks. But the Senate struck it out in Committee of the Whole a few days ago. I am satisfied it was done under a misapprehension. I should like to have a vote upon it, inasmuch as I understand that to be the condition of facts. It has been so stated to me to-day by one of the employees of the Department.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senate will concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, and if after investigation it turns out that the service requires any exemption, the President of the United States can himself make it under the civil-service law and regulations. So I think we had better adhere to the action of the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I should like very much, if we had a full Senate—I shall not, of course, embarrass the progress of the bill—but I should like to have the Senate decide why, when the President of the United States, voting in either of the two Houses of Congress, has one vote less than two-thirds of the whole legislative power of the Government, Congress is willing to divest itself of the power to follow the language and the meaning of the Constitution in creating in the heads of Departments, the power to designate at some time and under some cases of necessity persons for the employment of special work. Let us have that question decided and not put it under the vague and general proposition that the President of the United States can do this or do that.

The Congress of the United States divests itself all power; it loses the respect of the people of the country in its failure to assert the powers and to perform the duties imposed by our organic law. The Constitution says that Congress may create inferior officers, to be appointed by the heads of Departments, yet we are told constantly that the President of the United States possesses this great power, and has in every vote of this body one vote less than two-thirds of the whole legislative power of Congress, and we are not to exercise any of these powers.

I do not see that you can conduct the service of the Government when the Secretary of State asks for what? He asks that in the preparation of the consular reports for publication he shall be allowed to select officers capable of that work to be performed under his own eye. According to the appropriations heretofore made, five clerks who have been employed in his office do not come within the designations of the civil service, and we are told that we must not exercise our judgment. To what end shall three Commissioners not responsible to the people, the creatures of Executive power, be accorded the entire function of deciding who shall be the employees even to the smallest office?

For that reason I for one desire to protest against this abandonment of power on the part of Congress and vesting it in the President of the United States without reference to the heads of Departments, and vesting it in three Civil Service Commissioners. There is such a thing as carrying a rule to an extreme and absurd extent. There are exceptions to all rules.

When the Secretary of State says to Congress that "Here is a special work, which amounts to but little, in which I ask to be allowed to select five persons for the performance of the work," shall we say, "Oh, no; the President of the United States, if he thinks proper, can do it; whatever Congress may think, he may exempt these persons from the civil service"?

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be concurred in. It is no abandonment of power on the part of Congress. We can not appoint these designated employees. The Secretary of State is an executive officer, the appointee of the President. The Civil Service Commissioners are executive officers; they are the appointees of the President; they are the subordinates of the President, to carry out his will, to carry out his preferences. It is not right that the head of an Executive Department should come to us and ask us to give him special privileges which his master, the President, will not give him. The principle is not right.

We delegated this whole matter to the President, and now if we put any of these officers under civil service he can take them out. Congress never has sanctioned, except by acquiescence, the farcical extent to which the employees of the Government have been placed under the civil-service law and orders. It is not our fault that these men are there. Let any Cabinet officer go to the President and ask him to give him the power to make these selections. That is what ought to be done, and the President in a proper case ought to give him the power or order it to be done. We are not called upon to override practically the will of the President in these appointments, and that is what it would be doing. It would not be giving Congress any power to say who should be appointed or any influence in the appointment.

We began this system in 1883 and instituted a Civil Service Commission because the executive branch of the Government said it was necessary to enable it to reform the civil service as it then existed. There was then a Congress Republican in both branches and a Republican Executive. They said the civil service needed reforming and that such a law was necessary for its reformation. On that ground I voted for it and advocated it, but I never dreamed that the executive branch of the Government would carry the authority of the law to the extent to which it has been carried, even including copyists and messengers and watchmen, and everything else nearly that you can think of down to charwomen, who, I suppose, will be included after a while under a civil-service examination to test whether they are competent and have the skill to wash the floors of the different Department buildings.

I say let the responsibility rest upon the executive branch. It is no surrender of any power of Congress. The President has the power to control the Cabinet officers. They can go to him; he can exempt any of their clerks. In proper cases exemption ought to be exercised, but it is not for Congress to interpose by law and take away the power that he has heretofore exercised with his own subordinate officers.

Mr. CALL. Let us take the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, and reason about it a little, and see whether there is any foundation for it at all in reason. The question with us is, What is the best thing for us to do for the service?—not what the President of the United States may do or may not do. It is not what power he has or has not.

The Senator says it is farcical to put everybody under the civil service; that there should be some exceptions. Let us see what the organic law says. The President has the constitutional power to appoint—

All other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

If we think it is proper in respect of the advantage of the public service to appoint these five clerks by the head of the Department and not by three Civil Service Commissioners and not by the President, is it not an abandonment of our power and a denial of our duty if we fail to do it? What is it?

The organic law says that Congress shall have power to vest by law the appointment of those five clerks in the head of a Department. According to the Senator from Missouri, when the head of a Department says, "I can perform this executive duty better by having you exercise the power conferred in the Constitution to vest in me by law the power to appoint those five people," we should reply that though we think it is farcical to extend the civil-service law to this extent, though we think it is farcical to deny this power to the head of a Department, we will not do it, because the President of the United States may, if he sees fit, exempt you from it. The Constitution imposes the duty upon every member of this body to say when he thinks it proper to vest by law the appointment of inferior persons, either one or many inferior officers, in the heads of Departments.

Now, I say there is no one who can deny that the head of a Department, if he be worthy of that office, should have some discretion as to persons to perform duties requiring special trust and special knowledge.

The Secretary comes here and says, "Here is a kind of work for which I have been selecting persons." "What is it?" "It is the preparation of consular reports for publication and distribution. It is a kind of work for which no civil-service examination can ascertain a person's qualifications, and the control of which you have been giving to me for some years. The Solicitor of the Treasury has made a construction of the statute which prohibits payment of those people under the general appropriation. I ask that such words shall be inserted in the bill as will enable me to do that which I have been doing, preparing the consular reports in a proper manner and distributing them as required by law." When he says that, the Senator from Missouri says, "Oh, no; it is true that the extent to which the civil-service law has been carried is farcical, but we will not do that, because this is an Executive Department." That is the whole case.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we can now have a vote.

Mr. CALL. I desire to enter my protest against this perpetual denial to the people of the country of their rights through their representatives to make the laws of the country, as well as to protest against this concentration of power and this abandonment of duty on the part of members of this body.

Mr. CULLOM. We are trying to make laws for the country, and I hope we may have a chance to go on. I should like to know what the motion is that the Senator from Florida makes.

Mr. CALL. The motion is to disagree to the amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole in striking out the words "to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude."

Mr. CULLOM. The question will necessarily have to be on the whole amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. The question is simply on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. The Senator wants to know what the amendment is. I will state it. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the words "to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Florida simply desires a vote of the Senate upon the amendment to the amendment which the Committee on Appropriations reported agreed to as in Committee of the Whole. I think that is what he wishes in the premises.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Illinois does not state it right. The Committee on Appropriations reported an amendment to the bill, on page 22, to insert this provision:

For service of employees of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department, to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude.

Upon motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], I understand, the clause from the word "Department" and including the words "to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude" was stricken out.

Mr. COCKRELL. An amendment to the amendment was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, leaving out those words.

Mr. CALL. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Florida has reserved the amendment, and wishes to have those words restored. I suggest that he make the motion to insert them, and that will present the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole by inserting after the word "Department," in line 22, page 22, the words "to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude"; so as to read:

For services of employees of the Bureau of Statistics, State Department, to be selected by the Secretary of State by reason of special aptitude for the work of compiling and distributing consular and other commercial reports, namely, one clerk, at $1,400.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. Let us have a yea-and-nay vote on that.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator from Florida will not ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALL. I will let it pass over with the understanding that the amendment will be renewed afterwards.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire——

Mr. CULLOM. Let us dispose of this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to strike out the provisions about marshals.

Mr. CULLOM. That amendment has already been reserved and will come up later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be considered as concurred in.

Mr. CALL. It is understood that I will call for the yeas and nays after awhile.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Florida insists upon the yeas and nays we had better decide it now.

Mr. CALL. Very few Senators are present, and I do not want to impede the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. It will impede it just as much to have the question come up later. If the Senator insists upon a yea-and-nay vote we had better have it now.

Mr. CALL. I will let it go.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Florida withdraws the demand for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be considered as concurred in.

Mr. CALL. I have reserved two amendments. I wish to ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole by which the Senate struck out from line 4 to line 9, on page 5.

The other is the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole by which certain clerks of committees, beginning in line 10, were increased in number to 26, at $1,800.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole will be concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say that if this amendment is concurred in I shall move the amendment which I sent up to the desk, by which the committees named on page 4, with the exception of four, shall all be put in the class of $2,120, thus reducing——

Mr. CULLOM. Let us have one vote at a time.

Mr. CALL. I am giving notice of what I propose to do, so that the Senate may understand it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. Let us have the Senate understand it.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out all after line 3, on page 5, down to and including line 13, on the same page, and inserted:

For 28 clerks of committees, at $1,800 each, the sum of $50,400.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. Let us understand the amendment. The Senate committee reported this amendment, which was stricken out:

For clerks to the committees on Woman Suffrage, Mines and Mining, Immigration, Revision of the Laws of the United States, Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia, Indian Depredations, and Construction of the Nicaragua Canal, at $2,100 each, $14,700.

That was stricken out, as I have said. The 21 clerks of committees, in line 10, on the same page, were increased to 28 in number, at $1,800.

The object of the motion—I prefer to take the bill as the Senate Committee on Appropriations reported it—is to have the six or seven clerks retain the places assigned to them, at $2,120.

The other House, in sending the bill over, put into it a large number of committees with clerks at $2,220. If you intend to strike those committees off and put them in a class at $1,800, then all of the committees standing in the like situation should be put on the same foundation. Because the other House has undertaken to regulate the compensation of the committees of this body and to say which shall have payment and which shall not have payment at a particular rate is no reason why this body should permit an injustice to be done.

Let us see what committees there are in the bill as it came from the other House as to which the Senate committee properly reported an amendment.

The Committee on Engrossed Bills has a clerk at $2,220 and a messenger at $1,440. Why should that committee be advantaged in comparison with the other seven committees here which are stricken down to $1,800? What has that committee to do? That committee, like the seven here, or the most of them, was accorded to the minority when I came here, and the distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. Conkling, was then chairman of that committee, and the committee was properly equipped as a matter of respect to him. So it has continued ever since as a minority committee.

Take the Committee on Private Land Claims. There is another one at $2,220. What has that committee to do more than these committees? When Senators who have been here a long period of time have been assigned to those committees why should the clerks of some of the committees be put at $2,220 and the others, with Senators of equal experience and equal length of service as chairmen, be stricken down to $1,800?

Now let us go on. There is a provision for a clerk to the Joint Committee on the Library at $2,220 by the House arrangement. Why should that be given such a clerk in comparison with these seven committees?

Then there are clerks at $2,220 to the committees on the Census, on Indian Affairs, to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. What great work has the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate as compared with the committees which have been stricken down to $1,800? Why should it have $2,220?

Then there are the committees on Public Buildings and Grounds, Agriculture and Forestry, Education and Labor, and Territories. What have they to do more than these other committees? Then there are the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, the Committee on Private Land Claims, the Committee on Coast Defenses, the Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. I had the honor to be assigned to that committee at one time. I think it had nothing in the world to do. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] took all of its jurisdiction away from it by the appointment of a joint commission or something of that kind to perform the duties of all the committees of the Senate. What has that committee to do with a clerk at $2,220?

Let there be some fairness in this business. If you propose to assign clerks to committees and Senators to chairmanships of committees for some other reason than that they have great work to do, let the line be fairly drawn and let it not be a mere matter of favor. Here are all these committees that are held at $2,220. Then there are these other committees at $1,800. Take the clerk to the Committee on Woman Suffrage. I have the honor of being chairman of that committee, if it be an honor, and to my knowledge the clerk of that committee pays out of his own salary the expense of a stenographer. To my knowledge the correspondence from all the societies throughout the United States that are intensely interested in the subject of woman suffrage is quite onerous. It has, it is true, no great amount of legislation to consider, but the Senate created the committee in deference to the request of the women of the United States, and they properly regard it as a means of communicating in reference to public documents, petitions, and memorials, and correspondence of all kinds.

I have here in my desk a letter from the president of the Women's Congressional Society, I think it is called, upon this subject, calling for the publication of certain documents, and a large number of them, which they consider important and a matter of deference to the committee. Why should that committee be stricken down, while the Committee on Private Land Claims and the Committee on Engrossed Bills, which never had a bill before it, are allowed $2,220? I was a member of that committee for some years. It never had a meeting. Why shall these committees be selected for the benefit of particular persons and the others stricken down? The Senator from Illinois in charge of the appropriation bill makes no objection to this. He hopes the amendment concurred in as in Committee of the Whole will be retained.

Let us have some fairness about this matter. Let everybody stand on equal ground. If the Senate want to favor particular Senators on account of long experience here or because they stand in a particular attitude toward the country let them do it, but let it be fairly observed and put upon its proper ground. Here is the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who has been here a long time and is chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. His clerk is put down at $1,800. I think all that is wrong. Other Senators, who have just come to the Senate, have committees with $2,200 clerkships.

I ask for a yea-and-nay vote, to know whether or not the rule of discrimination and unfairness, without reference to duties performed by clerks of committees, is to be carried into effect in the bill. My amendment, when this is disposed of, will be to reduce the appropriation, by putting all the committees that I have mentioned, with the exception of Appropriations, Finance, and one or two others, upon the $2,120 basis.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GORMAN. I think that in the action taken by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole probably an injustice has been done. The clerks of the committees on Woman Suffrage and Mines and Mining have been heretofore paid $2,100. That is my recollection. Am I correct in that respect?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that after the word "dollars," in line 3, page 5, we insert the committees on Woman Suffrage and Mines and Mining to receive the same compensation they are now receiving, $2,100, and then the balance of it can stand.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the amendment. I intended to state that if that would be agreeable to the Senate, as those committees have heretofore had that sum for their clerks as other standing committees have had, I would have no objection to exempting them from the operation of the new amendment.

Mr. LINDSAY. When did those committee clerks begin to receive $2,120?

Mr. CULLOM. Many years ago.

Mr. LINDSAY. I think it was during the last Congress.

Mr. CULLOM. The Committee on Woman Suffrage has had a clerk at that salary for a number of years. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] can move the amendment so that it will be satisfactory.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 3, page 5, it is proposed to insert:

For clerks to committees on Woman Suffrage and Mines and Mining, $2,100 each, $4,200.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Then the succeeding amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole should be modified as to the number of clerks and the total.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole by striking out "eight," where it occurs, and inserting "six"; so that it will read:

For twenty-six clerks to committees, at $1,800, the sum of $46,800.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in, I wish to offer an amendment. In most of the Territories an increase has been made to the amount of the estimate. As to the Territory of New Mexico, it is represented that the appropriation for clerks in the surveyor-general's office is wholly inadequate, that the business is behind, and the estimate is $10,000.

Mr. CULLOM. What page does the Senator refer to?

Mr. COCKRELL. Page 92, line 11. Seven thousand dollars is allowed. I suggest that it be increased to $10,000, according to the estimate, and that in line 12 "twelve" be inserted instead of "nine."

Mr. CULLOM. I think the matter to which the Senator refers is not on page 92. The Senator has the wrong bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have the wrong print. I will look it up.

Mr. HOAR. While the Senator from Missouri is finding his place, I wish to make a suggestion in regard to the item relating to committees.

If this matter is stricken out and the substitute proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] goes into the bill, it of course will be a matter for the conference committee. Whether they will accept that in the end or whether the old arrangement will be left to stand or some other new arrangement substituted we can not know; and I should like to have added to the list of committees, if it can be done before that is stricken out, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, of which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] is chairman, so that if the old arrangement is retained that may be within the power of the committee of conference.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose it would be in the power of the conference committee to retain one or all of them. I thought we had already got the committee question pretty well settled to the satisfaction of the Senate. So far as I am personally concerned, it is my desire that the amendment shall be kept in such way as to give fair satisfaction to the great body of the Senators. I have recognized the fact that there is an inequality; that some committees are faring well while others are faring badly in the way of clerical service; but the amendment which has been adopted by the Senate, having been agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, is a very fair and reasonable settlement of the question, and I hope it will be retained.

Mr. HOAR. So do I, Mr. President. I do not rise for the purpose of disturbing that relation; but I wish to have it in the power of the conference committee, if the House does not agree to it, to do what they shall think right with reference to the committee of which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] is chairman. That is all.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we have that power as it stands.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Illinois thinks they have that power as it stands, I will not make any motion.

Mr. CULLOM. We can modify the amendment by making it one or two or ten, I suppose, or whatever number we please.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, when the clerk of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, a very hard-working committee and one which I think is very important, was put in the $1,800 list, I did not see proper to make any objection to it, although I think it is a very low compensation for the labor that has to be done and the necessary confinement during all the summer months. I was disposed to let the matter go along without any interference at all; but now a member of the Committee on Appropriations appeals to an old law which gave his committee $2,150, I believe, and thereupon, by the unanimous consent of the committee, his committee is taken out of the $1,800 category and put into the $2,100 category.

I hardly think that is exactly the right kind of treatment. I have been here twenty years making brick without straw, and I am perfectly willing to keep on with it, provided my neighbors and friends are put on the same level; but I do not think there is any reason for putting the Committee on Woman Suffrage at $2,100 and leaving the Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal at $1,800. I do not see the justice of it.

As to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, with respect to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has been kind enough to interpose in behalf of my colleague, who is not here, of course that committee has about as much to do with present affairs as the Revolutionary war had to do with the war in Cuba. No case ever comes before that committee; none possibly ever will come before it. I never yet heard of any Revolutionary claim coming before it for consideration. It is a mere indulgence given to the minority Senators, which at the same time I think is very properly given to them, and it is intended to be without any work at all.

I am in favor of making all proper concessions, but I do not want to have any unjust discrimination made against me. That is not right. Let the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] stand on the $1,800 basis, or let my committee go upon the $2,100 basis. Mine is a standing committee of the Senate, entitled to as much respect as is the Committee on Woman Suffrage or the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to say the least of it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama pardon me?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the theory upon which the Senate has gone hitherto in appointing the committees is that there was a certain number of chairmanships accorded by the majority to the minority of the Senate as a matter of courtesy and because the gentlemen on the other side had of course need of service in their important public duties. These chairmanships were filled by the minority by appointing the Senators oldest and longest in service here.

When the Republicans were in the minority in the Senate I was chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, and the duties of that committee consisted of one hearing and one report on a constitutional amendment, but the Democratic side of the Chamber, with great kindness, gave an annual clerk to the committee. I was an older Senator, and I estimated that I had to answer about 7,500 letters in the course of the year, and I do not think there was a harder-worked man in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts than that clerk was during that time.

Both of the Senators from Alabama are among the most distinguished and honored and esteemed Senators of this body, and among the longest in service, and I suppose that if the present plan is retained the whole Republican side of the Chamber would think the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], with his great public service and labors, ought to have an annual clerk at a compensation for a person competent to make researches and explorations under his direction as well as merely to conduct his correspondence.

As the clerk of the Senator's colleague is left out of the preferred list, although his colleague is one of the seniors in the Senate, my purpose in interposing was to suggest that the clerk for his committee should be put on, if we are going to retain the old system. I entirely agree to the new system instead of the old one, but I only want to make sure that if the other House does not consent to our new system and insists upon the old one the committee shall have the power to correct the injustice. That is the purpose of my interposing, and I understand the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] says there is no doubt that they will have that under their jurisdiction in conference.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not set up any personal claim whatever to favor or indulgence, although I am very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for his kind allusions to me for the work I have tried to do since I have been in this body. But I think it is a matter of justice. You have taken the Committee on Nicaraguan Claims and added to it the consideration of subjects relating to the Nicaraguan Canal, thereby not only——

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him to say a word?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULLOM. It may end this controversy. I appreciate very fully, I think, the very great service of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], especially in connection with the Nicaraguan question, and I believe I appreciate, to some extent at least, the great importance of the work that has to be done there as respects those matters. Personally I should be gratified if the Senator's clerk could have $2,100 salary instead of $1,800, which is provided in the general amendment that we have adopted.

I hope that in view of the Senator's service here and the great importance of the work he is charged with in connection with the new committee we may all agree to give his clerk a salary of $2,100, if that will be satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. It is entirely satisfactory. The other plan was satisfactory to me, except that I do not want any discrimination upon grounds that are not real.

The committee of which I am chairman has been made a standing committee of this body, and it is due to the character of the committee that it should have an annual clerk at a reasonable salary. I am not in favor of extravagant salaries, but I think, really, that the work which is required of that committee is going to be, as it is now, very heavy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The vote by which the amendment was concurred in will be considered as reconsidered, and the amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment so as to read:

For clerks to Committees on Woman Suffrage, Mines and Mining, and the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal, at $2,100 each, $6,300.
For twenty-five clerks to committees, at $1,800 each, the sum of $45,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], I should like to ask a question. I have just come into the Chamber. Is the salary of the clerk to the Committee on Engrossed Bills still continued at $2,200, with a messenger at $1,440?

Mr. CULLOM. None of the old clerks is interfered with at all.

Mr. WILSON. That committee has a messenger, too, at $1,440.

Mr. CULLOM. The committee has what it had before.

Mr. CANNON. I move, in line 25, page 3, to strike out the words "assistant clerk" and to insert the words "two assistant clerks at," and in line 1, page 4, after the word "dollars," to insert the word "each."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 25, page 3, strike out the words "assistant clerk" and insert "two assistant clerks at," and in line 1, page 4, after the word "dollars," to insert "each"; so as to read:

Clerk to the Committee on Pensions, $2,220; two assistant clerks, at $1,440 each.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not see any necessity for two assistant clerks, at $1,440 each.

Mr. CULLOM. I am inclined to think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know but that I am depriving the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] of the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Not at all.

Mr. WOLCOTT. On calling the attention of the industrious and very intelligent clerk of the Committee on Pensions to some bills for pensions which I have pending before that committee, as I think all of us have, I ascertained that not only the clerk and his assistants are overworked, but that the clerk out of his own salary, which is meager enough, is employing people to help him and is paying them out of his pocket in trying to get the docket up and procure information about the pensions cases. I trust—and I speak outside the committee—that the Senator from Illinois and every Senator will agree that the Pension Committee should have such clerical force as it needs. Our constituents are writing us all the time, at least mine are, "Why is not my case pressed?" "How does the delay occur?" "Congress is going to adjourn; no action has been taken on my case." It comes because every one of us as Senators has case after case introduced here by bill and we are pressing the committee to get a report, and their hands are tied because of an insufficient clerical force. The force can not look up the cases and get them before the committee which acts upon them and lays them before the Senate. I do hope the Senator will find his way clear to accept the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall not make any opposition. If the Senate thinks that provision should be made for an additional clerk, I have no objection.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall enter my objection to authorizing the employment of a second assistant clerk. I am unable to see that the Committee on Pensions are doing a work that requires the services of an extra clerk.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Before the Senator from Nebraska objects to the allowance of an assistant clerk it is only fair to him and to other Senators present that some information should be had of the character and extent of the work now imposed upon the Committee on Pensions. It is to-day absolutely overwhelmed. There are a thousand cases of general and special pension bills on the calendar of that committee. Already, so early in the session, 400 of those bills have had complete or partial consideration by the committee. There are coming to the committee now within a very few days, perhaps not more than a few weeks at most, probably 200 bills from the House of Representatives, and it is impossible for the committee, under existing circumstances, to give to such measures the prompt attention which they should have and which Senators on this floor are constantly demanding. As high as 60 bills have been introduced by one member of this body.

The clerk has been occupying the position for ten years. He is amply competent to perform all the service which one man can do. He has to employ a stenographer and to pay her out of his own pocket in order to keep the table anywhere near clear. Every member of the committee is assailed constantly by demands from other Senators because of the fact that the work is in arrears. It is unfair to the country and it is not in the interest of economy to have the work of the committee clogged. I hope the Senator will not object, because it is in the interest of expedition of the public service to have enough clerical assistance to perform the work and have the table clear. It is certainly not in the interest of the public service to have Senators engaged in the ostensible performance of their duty while the clerical force is insufficient to make senatorial labor effective.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the membership of the Committee on Pensions? There are 11 members of the committee, are there not?

Mr. CANNON. There are 13 members of the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know at what work the Committee on Pensions will put these clerks, but I infer that the business of the clerk, as he is employed now, is to make reports for the members of that committee to file in the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. I beg the Senator to let me interrupt him once more. I am a member of the Committee on Pensions, and so far as my short observation entitles me to speak, the clerks employed by the committee do not make the reports for individual Senators. On the contrary, I think it is a fact that every Senator who is a member of that committee has not only to do the work of examination of the cases apportioned to him as a subcommittee, but in nearly every instance he has personally to employ assistance. I know that this is true in my case. There are already 35 bills which would be apportioned to me as a subcommittee. It passed my own command of time and the time of my secretary, and I am compelled to employ expert assistance to examine the cases.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me. Is there not a great deal of routine information that has to be derived from the Departments as to accuracy of statements made and the record in each case, a service which those clerks have to perform for the committee generally in preparing the reports?

Mr. CANNON. That is absolutely the case.

Mr. HALE. I think I may say for one that I have found the Committee on Pensions very attentive to business and very laborious; and when I consider the number of cases on their docket as compared with other committees, however well worked and important, I do not think that an additional clerk will any more than put them even with other committees for the work they have to perform.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. I supposed I had the floor. However, I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to make a statement?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Some years ago I was chairman of the Committee on Pensions. We had a clerk and an assistant clerk, and, just as the committee is now, it was overwhelmed with bills that came in, and during the entire time I was chairman of the committee I do not suppose I ever had a letter written or the slightest service from either the clerk or his assistant. During all that time I employed a young man to do my work.

I do not think that any Senator should be required to do that; and if, as stated by the members of the committee, the committee is overwhelmed with work, it seems to me we ought to dispose of work of that character. It ought not to be left here. It ought to be disposed of intelligently, and it can only be done by getting information from the Departments, from the Pension Office and the War Department. There ought to be sufficient clerical force to do that, I am sure.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I am the last man in this Chamber who would captiously obstruct the work of the Committee on Pensions. I want to see its work done efficiently and well. I think, however, that some of us have a right to complain that bills which were introduced on the very opening days of the present session of Congress have been passed over and nothing has been done with them, while bills introduced by members of the committee have received some consideration at their hands and have been reported.

But passing over that matter as one of the things which probably may be considered as inseparable from the organization of committees, I am informed that this committee has a clerk, a very efficient man, and that it has a messenger, who is a stenographer, and does the stenographic work of the committee; each one of the members of that committee has a secretary, whose services ought to be devoted to the discharge of the business of the Senator in whose employ he is. I do not see anything about the work of the Committee on Pensions which would prevent a Senator to whom a bill was referred using the services of his own clerk in gathering the data necessary to report a bill either favorably or unfavorably.

I suppose it is true that every Senator in this Chamber has been compelled from time to time to employ extra help at his own expense. I know that is true in my case. I have been compelled to do it; and yet I have never called upon the clerk of the committee to furnish me with data or to formulate a report which I have made.

If I believed that this is necessary, and that it would expedite the business of the committee in the slightest degree, I should not object; but I do not believe that it would.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, either I failed to make the distinction clear when I interrupted the Senator from Nebraska or he has failed to appreciate it. The object of asking for this additional assistant is not that individual Senators may be relieved from the performance of their proper duty in acting as subcommittees and in making reports; it is merely that the general clerical work of the committee may be discharged by the clerks of the committee. No one proposes to have this assistant in order to aid individual Senators in the preparation of reports; but the work of the committee, with the present pressure of bills, can not be discharged by the officers paid by the Government, and the clerk employs and himself pays a stenographer. I think the Senator from Nebraska will not insist that it is proper that a clerk employed by the Government shall pay one-half of his salary to employ an assistant in order to discharge the duties of his position.

Mr. ALLEN. No, Mr. President, I do not propose to be put on that ground by the Senator from Utah. That is not the true ground upon which my objection stands. The Senator fails to be specific in his pleading here. He fails to state a thing that this assistant is to do that can not be done and is not being done by the present clerk and his messenger, or whatever force he may have there. What specific thing is there for this additional clerk to do? Will the Senator from Utah answer?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. There is for the clerk and his assistant the care of over 1,000 bills, with the most voluminous accompanying documents which probably on the average go to any committee of the Senate. The care of 1,000 bills, each one of which presses for attention; the care and the tabulation of all the papers which accompany the 1,000 bills, with the correspondence necessary between that committee and the Pension Bureau, ought certainly to be sufficient to justify the payment of one clerk and an assistant.

Mr. ALLEN. The committee has a chief clerk; it already has one assistant. Suppose there are 1,000 bills there to be put in wrappers and classified, and briefed possibly, and put in pigeonholes, where many of them are now and will remain. Then the clerk must dictate some letters to the Department calling for statistics or data upon which reports are to be based. Does the Senator from Utah think that one efficient clerk and one assistant can not do that work and do it with ease?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, if the Senator desires an answer to the question I will reply. The present assistant clerk must perform the work for the chairman of the committee, as he is the only person whom the chairman has to act as his secretary. Each Senator has his own secretary. The assistant clerk of this committee acts as the secretary of the chairman of the committee, and it is unfair, when every other Senator, regardless of the fact whether he is a chairman or not, has a secretary, that the chairman of the committee should not have some one upon whom to devolve the detail labor of his duty here. So we do not have the advantage in the committee proper of the services of the gentleman who is now enrolled as the assistant clerk.

Mr. ALLEN. There is not the slightest thing in that statement. The assistant clerk, as the committee is now organized, performs the work of private secretary to the chairman of the committee, which is proper. There is left whatever time he may have, and he certainly must have some time, and the time of the chief clerk, and the time of the messenger, who I understand is a stenographer, to attend to the duties of the committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not suppose either of us, not being upon the Committee on Pensions, can form a very adequate idea of exactly what the duties of these officials are; but I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that in another Chamber, where these matters are dealt with no more expeditiously and no more intelligently and no more carefully than in this, there are two Pension Committees, employing a force of eight clerks and assistants, whose work practically stands against the employment of one clerk in this Chamber.

Mr. President, there is one Senator in this body, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], who has some 60 bills pending before the Committee on Pensions; my colleague and I have some 30 apiece; the Senators from Pennsylvania have some 30; nearly all the Senators have from 15 to 30 pension cases pending in that committee, and their constituents are constantly asking them to press their claims. The Senator from Nebraska has but 2. It is natural that this pressure from constituents is not brought home to him with the same force that it is brought home to the rest of us.

I know from the inquiries I have made and the attempts I have made to obtain action upon bills which I have introduced that the Committee on Pensions is utterly overworked; that its members unselfishly devote hours of their time daily to the work of the committee; that there is not one of them who does not deny himself hours every day when he ought to be in this Chamber in order that he may attend to the duties of his committee; and I know that even if there were two clerks instead of one clerk more, as has been asked for, after they had been appointed and had done their work the efforts of Senators would still be required in framing the reports and in sifting the testimony. The clerks do not have anything to do with the making of reports. The clerks go to the Bureau and make inquiries; they go to the Secretary of War and gather the testimony; they get the case in readiness for the members of the committee to report upon it.

We are overwhelmed with work. There was a resolution introduced yesterday that we should adjourn on the 2d day of May, and it is believed we shall adjourn in May. The action of the Senator from Nebraska, if it shall be successful, will result in depriving scores of people in the United States, privates who served their time in the Army, from receiving pensions to which they are entitled. I know the Senator from Nebraska does not want to stand up in this body and by objecting to the employment of an additional clerk, whose labors this intelligent and self-sacrificing committee certainly need, deprive the people who are entitled under the law to their pensions and by the action of Congress to the favorable consideration of their bills.

I will state further that 25 per cent of all the bills that come into the Senate go to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLEN. Let me reply briefly to the Senator from Colorado.

In the first place, he calls attention to the fact that there are some seven or eight assistant clerks in the House of Representatives. The Senator must remember, however, that there are 356 members of the lower House of Congress.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But they do not get more bills than we get, and they do not act on so many.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is certainly mistaken on that point, because they set apart every Friday night and hold a session of the House of Representatives for the express purpose of passing upon pension bills and for no other purpose.

I do not propose to have the Senator from Colorado put me in the attitude that he seems to desire to do, of antagonizing the work of the allowance of pensions. I am in favor of every man who is entitled to a pension having it. I will do anything I can to procure it for him. I have announced that so frequently that there ought not to be any misunderstanding on the part of the Senator from Colorado or any other person upon that subject; but I do not propose that members of the Committee on Pensions shall be able truthfully to go out into the country and say that I obstructed the passage of pension bills because I objected to the Committee on Pensions having an assistant clerk when, in my judgment, that assistant clerk is not needed.

The truth is, Mr. President, that it costs more, I am informed by reliable authority, to run the United States Senate, independently of the salaries that are paid Senators, than it costs to run the Military Academy at West Point in the State of New York. These expenses are becoming enormous, and there seems to be no disposition whatever upon the part of any person to call a halt or to stop at some convenient point. The employment of an assistant clerk for the Committee on Pensions will be followed pretty soon by a bill or an amendment to employ assistant clerks in other committees, and the truth will be after a while that every Senator will have four or five employees in his service at the expense of the Government. There is no necessity for it.

The Senator from Colorado speaks about the number of bills he has introduced and the few bills which I have introduced. I have had many requests to introduce bills. There are as many soldiers in the State of Nebraska, according to its population, if not more, than there are in the State of Colorado. But I do not believe that a Senator should introduce a bill which has no merit in it simply for the effect it may have upon his political fortunes. I could introduce a basketful of bills if it were necessary or proper to do so; but I usually take the precaution to examine into the merits of the applicant before I introduce his bill. I do not think because bills are turned in here through the Senate as water is turned through a sieve that therefore additional assistance should be employed by the Committee on Pensions. I base my objection solely upon the ground that the employment of an assistant clerk is absolutely useless, and can not in the nature of things facilitate the business of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I served as chairman of the Senate Committee on Pensions for six years, and perhaps have some of the qualifications of experience to give my opinion on this subject.

I think the objections of the Senator from Nebraska are based upon a misconception of the method in which the business of that committee is necessarily conducted. In the first place, the statement has been correctly made that nearly one-half the bills which come under the consideration of this body are referred to that committee. I know personally from the experience of six years how much exacting and self-denying toil by Senators is necessary to do justice to this most meritorious class of claims. The present chairman of the Senate Committee on Pensions [Mr. GALLINGER] is a man of great experience in those labors. I am perfectly convinced that he would not ask for anything that he did not think was imperatively needed by the necessities of the branch of the service in which he is engaged.

In regard to the so-called perfunctory duties that are performed by the Senators comprising that committee and their clerks, let me correct the Senator from Nebraska a little. It is a rule of the committee that no claim for a pension shall be granted by statute until it has been adversely passed upon by the Pension Office. That rule is almost invariable. It must be a very exceptional case, one not contemplated by the law at all—I mean where the Pension Office can not afford relief—which exempts a case from the application of that rule.

I will state the mode of procedure. A bill is introduced and the original file upon which the Pension Office has predicated its rejection of a claim is sent for to the Pension Office and taken charge of by the committee. Those files are in most cases more voluminous than any ordinary court file. They are composed of affidavits, reports, examinations, tests sometimes by the Department itself, which require the most minute and scrutinizing examination both of questions of fact and law. Those files are gone over and examined with all the care of a referee or a judge in a civil case. It takes hours to go through one of them with any accuracy or sufficiency at all. The clerk can not do that and he does not do it. No clerk ever made a report for me; no clerk makes reports for other members of that committee. The sum and substance of it is, that to do one's duty faithfully in that committee takes away from the Senate the advantage and assistance of his deliberations and counsel in many matters of the highest importance.

I am not in general in favor of the increase of the clerical force, but I felt during my term of service on that committee that more help was imperatively needed. I think, under the enormous increase of business which has supervened upon that body under conditions for the last two or three years, the request is not only reasonable, but one which it is absolutely necessary to comply with if we intend to render to the soldiers any sort of attention to their claims at all commensurate with their imperative merits.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope we shall now have a vote on the amendment. I think the Senate understands it.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if he proposes to make a point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator has employed the point of order here very frequently upon this and other bills.

Mr. CULLOM. I have not employed it more than once or twice.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to suggest to the Senator——

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator wants to make a point of order, he can do so. I shall not make it, because I am inclined to believe that perhaps this assistant clerk ought to be given.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I will take the responsibility of making the point of order under Rule XVI.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator to withdraw the point of order for just one moment.

Mr. ALLEN. I will do that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection, of course, to the Senator making the point of order. That is the Senator's privilege.

Mr. President, I do not even now know exactly what is under consideration, and I should like very much to be informed before the point of order is made, because I may desire to be heard just one moment.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the Secretary report the amendment, so that the Senator from New Hampshire may understand what it is.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 25, before the word "assistant," it is proposed to insert the word "two," and to strike out the word "clerk" and insert "clerks," and after the word "dollars," in line 1, on page 4, to insert the word "each"; so as to read:

Clerk to the Committee on Pensions, $2,220; two assistant clerks, $1,440 each; messenger, $1,440.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to make one or two observations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire address himself to the point of order?

Mr. GALLINGER. The point of order, I understood, was withdrawn for the moment.

Mr. ALLEN. I withdrew it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I made that request, and the point of order was withdrawn.

This proposed amendment was not suggested by me, and I am not at all responsible for it, although I think it a very just amendment. I desire to state precisely my position in regard to this matter, and I state it for the reason that as I approached the Senate Chamber coming from the committee room, where I had been engaged in work for other Senators, the question was propounded to me whether I was purposely absent during this discussion. I had no knowledge that this discussion was to occur, and hence my absence from the Senate Chamber had nothing whatever to do with it.

Now, a few words as to what I have said and done looking to an increase of the force in the room of the Committee on Pensions and some facts concerning the work of the committee.

I took upon myself the chairmanship of that committee with a full knowledge of the fact that it was a committee to which a vast amount of work would necessarily go, and that somebody would have to perform an unusual amount of labor if the affairs of the committee were properly conducted. I had had service on a similar committee in the other House of Congress, and I had had service for four years on this very committee in this body, and hence knew something of the work; but notwithstanding this I did not adequately realize the measure of labor and responsibility that would come to it.

There have been during the present session, I think I may safely say, an unusual proportion of bills which have been presented to the Senate, referred to that committee. I have not counted them up recently, but I think I can safely say that about one-third, or nearly one-third, of all the bills which have been presented in this body are before that committee now or have been reported, and are now on the Calendar or acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. President, I am not in the habit of obtruding my individual affairs upon the Senate or even upon my friends, and yet I feel constrained to say that I have worked in that committee room from 9 o'clock in the morning until 6 in the evening, except the time I have been in this Chamber, every day since the beginning of the Congress, and I have worked there every Sunday from 10 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the afternoon. That is a matter known to some others as well as to myself. The work has been carried on in just that way, so far as the chairman is concerned.

I am personally interested in very few of the bills, but a very large proportion of the Senators, on both sides of the Chamber, are interested in them. Senators come to me about their bills, asking that they may be expedited, and I am always very glad to accommodate them if I can. I have put myself out very much in behalf of other Senators, and it has been a delight and a pleasure for me to do it, even at the expense of my own convenience and my own comfort. I have personal charge of the bills for the New England States and the State of New York, but reference to the Calendar will disclose the fact that I have reported bills from all parts of the country, the examination of the papers and the writing of the report in each case requiring much time and patience as well as a certain kind of technical knowledge.

Two years ago certain matters came to my attention in connection with the work of the committee of which I will now briefly speak. I then found that the clerk of the committee—who is not a man from my own State, a resident, I think, of Minnesota, and a gentleman whom I have been glad to continue in that position, notwithstanding I have had many applications from my own State for the place, because of his military services and large experience—was paying a young lady stenographer and typewriter out of his salary. That custom has been continued until the present time. As I understand the matter, and I am sure I am not mistaken, Mr. Johnson, the clerk of the committee, has paid that young lady, who is in the committee room every morning at 9 o'clock and remains there until between 5 and 6, a salary for several years—I do not know how much—out of the amount which he receives as clerk of the committee.

Mr. President, I have no concealments about this matter. My own son is the assistant clerk of the committee. I prefer to keep him there, as he attends to my private correspondence, and I presume that it is not a matter of just criticism that he should be there instead of some one else. He is of more service to me than any other young man could be, and performs his duties faithfully so far as the interests of the public service are concerned.

Mr. President, I propose to tell the whole story so far as I am personally connected with this matter. When this appropriation bill was under consideration by the Committee on Appropriations I addressed a letter to my friend at my left [Mr. CULLOM], who I understood had charge of it, and I made the suggestion to him that I thought it might be a proper thing to increase the salary of the assistant clerk of the committee from $1,440 to $1,800. I think I said in that letter (if I did not I certainly meant to do so) that the added salary would be taken from the assistant clerk and given to the young lady, and in that way the clerk of the committee would be partially relieved of what I think is a very unfair thing. Mr. Johnson is a man who has an invalid wife, and my sympathies went out to him, feeling that he was paying too much out of his salary for clerical assistance which is absolutely needed in the committee room, and without which the business of the committee would not go along to the satisfaction of the Senate. I did not give the matter as careful thought as I might have done, else I would doubtless have asked what the amendment pending contemplates. What I suggested occurred to me as one way in which relief could be secured, and I asked it. The Senator from Illinois did not report the suggested amendment, and he will bear me out when I say that I have sat beside him in the Senate ever since and I have not even mentioned the subject to him. I have not asked him why he did not do it. I took it for granted that the committee exercised their judgment and discretion in the matter, and that they thought it was not a wise thing to do.

That is all I have done about this thing, and I have sought the opportunity to make this explanation lest something might have been said in my absence which would have placed me in a false position. More clerical assistance than is now furnished ought to be supplied, but I have not felt like persistently or unduly pressing the matter. That is all I care to say about it.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to say a word. The Senator from New Hampshire has stated the exact truth, so far as any conversation between him and myself is concerned and also in addressing the letter to me. The chief clerk of that committee has also talked to me in reference to the matter on the line of adding something to somebody's salary, so that that addition might be taken to pay an assistant typewriter. I did not quite see how I could do that, or that the Senate would be inclined to do it, and I did not know what the temper of the Senate might be with reference to an additional assistant clerk. I have learned more about the exact situation since this item has been under discussion than I knew before, and as it has gone along I have made up my mind that the assistant clerk ought to be allowed by the Senate, because I know not only from the Senator himself, the chairman of the committee, but from the clerk, that the clerk has been paying a part of his salary in order to keep the work up as well as he could. Under the circumstances I do not care to make the point of order upon the proposed amendment, and I hope my friend from Nebraska, after hearing the chairman, will not do so either.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I want to say just a word, and then I will let the amendment be voted on.

I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that nothing was said in his absence by me or by anyone else involving this matter that ought not to be said. I have no purpose to object to the employment of all the clerical assistance that may be necessary in the transactian of the business of this Chamber, and above all I have not the slightest desire to obstruct the business of the Committee on Pensions. That is the last committee whose business I would obstruct if I had it within my power to obstruct any. I am in entire sympathy with its desire and attempt to present bills here as speedily as they can be presented for the consideration of the Senate.

But, Mr. President, the same thing of which Senators complain with reference to the Committee on Pensions exists with reference to the Committee on Claims. The duties of the two committees are almost identical. The Committee on Claims is simply a court; that is all. It is an equity court, a court where the files, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] well said with reference to the Committee on Pensions, exceed in number the ordinary court files. It becomes the duty of every member of that committee to whom a claim is referred not only to examine the evidence that is on record, the ex parte evidence of the depositions, but very frequently to call in witnesses and examine them and find out the history of the claim and report upon its merits. These claims involve not only that, but they involve the examination of records, and very frequently inquiries from the Departments or Bureaus. That is done in every instance by the Senator or by his clerk.

Now, the Committee on Pensions, in addition to having a very efficient chief clerk and a very efficient assistant clerk and a messenger, has, or should have, the assistance of thirteen different clerks, the clerks of the Senators who compose that committee. When a bill is referred to a member of the committee for examination, it passes from the jurisdiction of the committee until he reports it back, and he should employ the services of his own clerk, or devote his own services, if need be, in examining into its history and preparing and making the report. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire speaks of his being overworked; I have no doubt of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not complain of that at all. I stated the fact.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not understand it to be spoken of in the way of complaint at all, but I can say to the Senator, speaking personally, that for myself I have not been out of my committee room, except when I have been here, until 10 or 11 o'clock at night for two months. I am, unfortunately, a member of the Committee on Claims, and it seems to me sometimes that every old claim that has been on file in the Senate for twenty-five or thirty years has been sent to me, claims that involve the examination of 150 or 200 and sometimes 300 papers. I do my work as best I can. I think the members of this committee should do their work as best they can. However, in view of the fact that the Senator in charge of the pending bill thinks that it is not his duty to make the point of order upon the amendment, but who does occasionally make a point of order upon a meritorious amendment and by that means eliminate it from the proposed legislation, I think I will leave the responsibility with him to make it or not to make it, as he sees fit.

Mr. CULLOM. All right. I am glad the Senator has adopted that course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. The adoption of the amendment renders necessary a change of the total on page 5, line 3. I move at that point to strike out "$94,480" and insert "$95,920."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. It is proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], I understand, to move to strike out certain sections of the bill in relation to marshals and district attorneys, beginning at the bottom of page 115, section 5. I suppose that it will be his purpose to strike out all that part which pertains to those subjects, and if that is his purpose he can make his motion to include all the bill beginning with the twenty-fourth line on page 115, and ending with the fifteenth line on page 134. All of that part pertains to the proposed change of the system in relation to marshals and district attorneys.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Illinois correctly states the proposition I intended to submit to the Senate, although I do not intend at this late hour of the day to embarrass the committee in any way. In my judgment, however, this is a mistake, and all of these provisions in regard to marshals and judges and district attorneys, all of this reorganization, I will say, of the judiciary department of the Government of the United States ought not to be made upon an appropriation bill.

As a rule, no important legislation ought to be ingrafted upon an appropriation bill. We all admit that, and yet we constantly violate that rule. The established rule of almost every legislative body is to confine appropriations to the distribution of money to the various public objects. The practice of attaching legislation to appropriation bills has largely increased of late. Formerly, thirty or forty years ago, it rarely occurred, and only when it became necessary, either by the urgency of a political faction or to accomplish some political purpose, was a legislative amendment placed on an appropriation bill.

Here is a most striking example of the dangers which may occur from this kind of legislation. Here is a bill that is brought to us from the Committee on Ways and Means, in no way connected with the judicial department. We have committees organized in both Houses of Congress to deal with these subjects-matter. They are all composed of lawyers, without exception, leading members especially of the bar, belonging to either House of Congress, and measures of that kind can not be dealt with by persons who have not been trained as lawyers.

The first objection I have to the system proposed is the general principle that it is faulty; that it is bad legislation to encumber an appropriation bill with legislative provisions affecting the whole judicial department of the Government of the United States. I know that such bills have been pending in both Houses, and they ought to be there framed by the proper committee. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who sits by my side made, I thought, some very wise remarks upon this subject. The propositions now ingrafted in the pending appropriation bill have been considered by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and they were not able to agree upon them. They were not able to act upon them; they made no report upon them. I do not know the history of the measure in the House of Representatives, or how it came to be attached to the bill before the Senate, but it is certain that the principle is adopted of ingrafting in a bill that must be passed provisions to which there may be marked opposition, and which could not pass upon their own merits. That is the first and the radical objection to this part of the bill. But that is not all.

I have read this portion of the bill with a good deal of care. I believe the rates of compensation fixed for these officers is entirely too high. I believe it is too high not only in Ohio but in Arizona, because it is proposed to give the same compensation to the officers in Arizona as in Ohio. It seems to me that dealing with many of the States, especially where the population is small, and where therefore the compensation paid by the State officers is comparatively small, it is an apparent outrage to pay to the marshals $4,000 or $5,000, when the ordinary officers of the State courts receive probably only one-third of that amount. It is making a marked discrimination against the wisdom of Congress in dealing with salaries. A district attorney in Columbus, Ohio, performing the duties of a district attorney in the courts of the United States ought not to receive any more than would be paid, according to the habit and custom of our people, to a common prosecuting attorney. In almost every city in Ohio there are more cases tried of far greater importance than the cases tried in both the Federal courts of the State, and yet higher salaries are to be given to these officers than the salary paid the highest officer of the State government. Now, this is an objection.

This is a time when of all other times we ought to be careful about the appropriation of money. The appropriations now being made at the present session of Congress are more than the revenues of the Government, and therefore at a time when our revenues are insufficient to carry on the operations of the Government it is proposed to increase very largely the salaries of these officers. A salary of $4,000 or $5,000 a year is a very large salary in nearly all of the Western States.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any salary that the Senator knows of increased in the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I only know that the Senate have largely increased the salaries proposed by the House.

Mr. HOAR. That is another matter. If the Senator will pardon me—I do not wish to interrupt him, because he is making a very important and interesting statement—but I understood him to say, I suppose inadvertently, that we were increasing the salaries of these officers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I intend to come to that.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, all these salaries are cut down by the bill. It is true we make them higher than the House proposed.

Mr. COCKRELL. But not higher than these officers are now receiving.

Mr. HOAR. Not higher than they are now receiving.

Mr. SHERMAN. At present the marshals and district attorneys and nearly all the officers of the courts of the United States are paid by fees. The clerks of the courts of the United States are paid by fees. Whether those fees are more than the salaries here provided is not a question that is material here. They now receive fees. In my judgment it is far better that they should be paid by fees rather than directly from the Treasury, because under the system proposed there will be no motive whatever for either a clerk or marshal or district attorney to collect from the litigants the fees that have been paid them under previous laws. Whether those fees amounted to more than the salaries here provided is not material, but the very moment you give these officers full salaries, with no motive whatever to collect the fees which the law prescribes, as a matter of course you do it at the expense of the Government of the United States. It is true the bill provides that the fees which are now paid to clerks and marshals, etc., shall be paid into the public Treasury, but who will collect those fees? What inducement is there for those officers to collect the fees and pay the money into the Treasury of the United States? The amount of the fees now collected is amply sufficient.

There are always many candidates for all these offices. They are all desirable positions from the point of honor. Everybody would like to be a district attorney of a United States court, and the office of clerk we all know is a very important one; but what motive will these officers have to collect fees for the Government of the United States? The fees will not be collected. The result is there will be more paid out of the Treasury of the United States in consequence of this salary provision than would be paid in the way of fees. Everybody knows that that will be the natural result.

I think on these two grounds, without going into the details, we ought not to pass the salary provision now. It ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary and there be carefully considered in all its details.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to put a question to the Senator from Ohio. He intends to move to strike out the House provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not a Senate amendment. It is a part of the bill that the House has sent to us. Now, the Senate strikes that out. We get into conference. The House members refuse to yield. What shall the Senate do? Would the Senator stand by the conferees of the Appropriations Committee then and keep Congress here for weeks or months or defeat the bill entirely? That is the question that confronts the Committee on Appropriations and the conferees. Remember, the Committee on Appropriations did not insert this in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I see that.

Mr. COCKRELL. It came here from the House and then was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to consider it. The Committee on Appropriations simply adopted the report of the Judiciary Committee. So it is the work of the Judiciary Committee as completely as if it had been brought in as a separate bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see that that alters the argument. A law must have the assent of both Houses. If the House of Representatives violate their own rules, because their rules prohibit this——

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no; I beg the Senator's pardon. It was passed through the House in accordance with their rules. All these provisions were put on by the rules of the House. They have what they call standing rules, but then they have a Committee on Rules which brings in an order, and that order becomes the rule for the time being in the consideration of the bill just as much as their standing rules. Does the Senator talk about their rules? It is absolute power. They can pass a bill under their rules with any kind of legislation on it if they have an order, because that order suspends all other rules as to that particular item.

Mr. SHERMAN. It makes no difference; everyone concedes that legislative provisions on an appropriation bill which do not affect the very items of the bill itself ought not to be there. That is the established rule of parliamentary law. If the House of Representatives send us a bill full of legislative measures affecting the whole of one of the great departments of our Government, increasing the salaries that are paid out of public money very largely, because heretofore this compensation was made up by fees paid by litigants and others, and therefore the whole of this burden is now thrown upon the Government, it seems to me we have the right to say to the House of Representatives——

Mr. COCKRELL. Will not the fees be paid into the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. They will not be collected. I have already said that Senators who are familiar with these courts, as I am to some extent, know that the fees will not be collected by either class of these officers. They get their salaries, and what do they care? They will not look after the fees of the Government.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that a good deal of the money that is paid as fees is paid by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. In cases.

Mr. TELLER. In very many cases a large proportion of the salary of the district attorneys is now simply paid by the Government as fees.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be true to some extent, but there is in the courts of the United States a multitude of suits between private parties.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Colorado is probably familiar with one point here, and I should like to have the information. I ask him if it is not true that the fees are not collected in many cases—if there are not many cases where they can not be collected because of the poverty of the defendants, and so the attorneys and marshals, etc., are paid out of the Treasury?

Mr. TELLER. In such cases they are paid by the Government, I understand.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the Government will get into the Treasury under this proposed law exactly as much as it gets credit for now?

Mr. SHERMAN. The fees are paid by the United States only in cases in which the United States is interested, but the great mass of the litigation in the United States courts is not between the United States and its citizens; it is between litigants in controversies in which the Government has no interest. Therefore it is not an excuse to the Senate of the United States to allow a measure of this kind to be ingrafted on an appropriation bill because the House has done so. The House has often reproached the Senate for doing the same thing. We have submitted to the reproach and sometimes yielded to it where they have made a determined opposition to a legislative provision. But here is a proposition that was pending before the Judiciary Committee, I understand from what the Senator from Massachusetts said. It had been pending also before the Judiciary Committee in the House. It is put on this omnibus bill in order to carry it through when it could not be carried through by the force of its own merits. Now, that is the position. If we do not stop this process of legislating on appropriation bills we had better abandon all the rest of the committees and put everything on the appropriation bills and in that way get them through. But we ought not to do it.

But there are provisions in the pending bill objectionable besides the mere fact that they are legislative. The salaries are too high, in my judgment. I think every salary even provided by the House is larger than similar salaries in the States. But I see several provisions here that I do not like. These provisions, which I will not read, seem to take from the Treasury Department most of the accounting that is now required in that Department and carry it to the Attorney-General. The Attorney-General is by the plain provisions of this bill made practically a comptroller and an auditor. All the accounts are to be sent to him for examination and approval, according to the bill. There is no provision in the bill, although probably the general law will carry the accounts finally to the Auditor and Comptroller of the Treasury Department.

The bill also provides that the Attorney-General shall pay out of his Department all the salaries that are provided for by this proposed legislation. It seems to me that withdraws from the payments the surveillance now fixed by law for the Treasury Department by the combination of auditors and comptrollers and the various officers who are paid to take care of and protect the money of the Government.

There are several of the provisions that seem to be blind. I have inquired the meaning of them of Senators and can not ascertain precisely, although it is said that one of the provisions which requires all the salaries to be paid in the office of the Attorney-General was provided for by an act of Congress a year or so ago.

All I wish to say now is that on the whole the practice of placing important legislative provisions on the appropriation bills ought not to be adopted at this time. This part of the bill ought to be stricken out. Sometimes, as a matter of necessity, both Houses of Congress find it convenient to put on appropriation bills important legislation, and where that legislation is undisputed and uncontroverted, and where it is apparent to anyone that it ought to be adopted either on an appropriation bill or anywhere else, there is not so much objection to it. Although persons familiar with legislation are opposed to mingling general legislation with merely financial appropriations, it is done occasionly. It is done sometimes to attain a political object. I have myself participated in putting on amendments of this kind when some important object was to be attained. But there is no hurry about this matter. We have had the system of fees of attorneys, clerks, and officers of this kind since the beginning of the Government, and now it is proposed in this sudden way (for I never knew anything about it until I took up the bill and read it) to change the whole manner of conducting this great Department of the Government.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me a word? Is he quite sure that change is made? Are not all the accounts of district attorneys and marshals now sent in the first instance to the Attorney-General, and then transmitted to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is nothing, I say, in the bill about that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I may be wrong and the Senator may be right, but I supposed that the accounts of every Department of the Government went in the first instance to the head of the Department, and were by him transmitted to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true. The same rule as respects the accounting of the moneys appropriated will apply under this bill that now applies under existing law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt that somewhat. If Senators will look at the peculiar provisions of the bill they will have a doubt on that point. But at any rate there is no affirmative legislation here requiring that the accounting of money paid to the judicial department shall be made by the proper officers of the Treasury Department. Probably that might be covered by the general provision of the existing law, but there is no provision of that kind here. Indeed this is a measure solely in the interest of the officers I have named, the clerks, attorneys, etc. There are many provisions in the bill that ought to require the careful scrutiny of the Committee on the Judiciary. This bill seems to have been withdrawn from the committee of this body which had it in charge, I do not say by the action of the Senate, but by the action of the House, and thus we are called upon to experiment in legislation. All I desire to say is that I should like to strike out this provision and leave it to be legislated upon more at leisure after a careful examination, not to transfer to the Committee on Appropriations the business of the Committee on the Judiciary, and not to compel the Committee on Appropriations, when they are treating only with subjects of appropriations, to consider and pass upon legislative provisions contained in the bill under their keeping. All of this proceeding disturbs and changes the regular ordinary course of business in the Senate.

Now, with these remarks, Mr. President, I will conclude, so far as I am concerned. I should like to have a vote upon this question, and I hope that the Senate will take my view and postpone this matter until the next session of Congress at least, when it may be acted upon in a proper way—in the ordinary way—by the Committees on the Judiciary of the two Houses.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I shall support the motion of the Senator from Ohio to strike out this matter from the appropriation bill for the reasons so clearly stated in his interrogatory by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. While the Senator from Ohio was speaking the Senator from Missouri, a member of the Appropriations Committee of long experience and formerly its chairman, rose and said: "What are you going to do if we vote to strike out this provision and the House insists? If we do not agree with the House and the House insists, are you going to prolong the session two or three weeks or let an appropriation bill fail?"

Now, when that argument is presented to the Senate of the United States I think the honorable Senator from Ohio is entirely right in saying that the Senate ought not to stand it. We are one of the two legislative branches of the Government, and no affirmative legislation ought to pass making new laws, changes in our proceedings and public policies, unless it has the assent of the reason and conscience of this body. Whenever we undertake to say such a thing as that to the House, they treat it with great respect and say: "If you are going to force on us what we do not believe in and disapprove of, we shall not consent, and you may take the consequences."

I understand the rule of proceeding on the part of the House toward the Senate is, "You shall not be permitted to insist on any new legislation that has not the assent of both bodies"; and we have always dealt with them in that way. If the House undertake to assume the position of forcing a failure of the appropriation bill by putting new legislation on the bill, they are undertaking to do an unconstitutional thing, to wit, to get new general laws upon the statute book to which the Senate does not agree. It is in substance withholding the supply unless they can be the only legislative body. So for that reason I shall vote to strike out this general legislation on an appropriation bill of this kind.

However, I do not agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio in his opposition to the proposed legislation. First, he says it is suddenly brought in here. It has been a subject of consideration in the Judiciary Committee for six years and in the Senate for that time. We have tried and tried to agree upon a proper provision. The complaint comes from all over the country that while the district attorneys, marshals, clerks, and commissioners are dependent upon fees, there is a multiplication of small and vexatious causes that swell those fees; that poor men are plucked, men who are guilty of trifling offenses, Indians who sell liquor, liquor offenses against the revenue or the postal laws. Some one puts on the outside of a pamphlet that he sends, as a lady who is of very near kin to me did a few years ago, "Please return," innocent that it is a violation of the postal laws of the United States, and some official gets up a prosecution against that person.

Then, when they are prosecuting, a deputy marshal summons witnesses. He first brings the offender to the commissioner. The whole thing ought to be disposed of in ten minutes; but the commissioner continues it. Then half a dozen witnesses are summoned on the day to which it is continued. The marshal has summoned half a dozen witnesses when one would do, and he gets a fee for summoning each one of those witnesses. The commissioner gets two days instead of one. On the slightest pretext the case is adjourned, and the commissioner gets his third day's fee and the marshal gets his fee for attendance, and so on. That complaint comes up from all over the United States. It comes from Boston. It comes from places where Indians are found and commit petty offenses. It comes from moonshiner districts in other States, and so on. Therefore very reluctantly I have come to the conclusion that we must put a stop to the system of paying these officers by fees, and I believe that is the judgment of the whole Senate with substantial unanimity.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] drew up a bill. It was reported by the committee. It broke down. I think the committee has been at work on it eight years. It was the second time we took it up that we reported the bill and it failed. We have been at work at the present session, and we have two bills which have been reported and are now on the Calendar. So there is no suddenness in this matter. Then the House sent over a scheme on an appropriation bill. We sent our bills to the Appropriations Committee, and they have in substance taken what the Judiciary Committee had agreed upon, if I am not mistaken, with hardly any changes in that particular.

Although I agree with my honorable friend in most of his general positions, I do not agree with him in the belief that these salaries are too high. The United States ought to have in every district in this country a representative who is a lawyer of the first grade, and not merely an ambitious, pushing young gentleman who thinks he would like the salary. They may at any time in the seaports have a case involving our international relations in times of war. Prize causes have to be presented by the district attorney. In times of peace they may have questions affecting our neutrality laws and questions affecting our revenue laws. Within the last two months the district attorney in San Francisco, who gets under this bill I think only $5,000 a year, has had to represent the United States in the great case of the claim against the Leland Stanford estate, involving millions upon millions. If any lawyer who is a member of the Senate—if my honorable friend from Colorado had been retained in that case everybody would have thought his compensation was small if he had asked $25,000 as a fee, so great was the responsibility. In Boston the district attorney was very recently arguing a great question against the defendants in the Maverick Bank case. The president and some directors of that institution had conducted that bank in the interest of their own speculations. It was one of the most difficult and responsible and important prosecutions that we ever had in Boston.

Mr. ALLISON. May I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to another very important case arising under the tariff law of 1894, wherein there was a little provision inserted about withdrawing distilled spirits in bond? There is now a dispute in the courts involving $12,000,000 under that provision. All these are very important questions.

Mr. HOAR. When we dealt with the question of the salaries of the district judges it was said: "Why, the district judge in Delaware, to whom we propose to pay $5,000 a year, is employed but for two months out of the twelve." The answer was made, which in the end satisfied the Senate by a large majority, and the House, too: "If he is employed but two months out of the twelve, he has got to hold himself aloof from other occupations; he has got to be a man fit for the great questions which may come before him, and he must hold himself at the command of the public service the whole year. He is a man who may at any time have in the district court the trial of a question on which depend the dignity and authority of the United States. He may have in the circuit court to decide some vast patent question like the Bell telephone case, involving millions upon millions. Therefore it is to the interest of the United States to have a man competent for that responsibility."

This bill goes on the ground in general (the salaries for the southern district of New York and the District of Columbia being excepted, because they are special) that these salaries should range from four to six thousand dollars a year, what a bright, capable young man who has been in the profession ten years in any of our commercial cities can easily earn.

It seems to me, with all the study I can give to it, that the bill which the Judiciary Committee has reported is not unreasonable in this particular. As it is, all the salaries in the country are $6,000 a year now, with the limitation that if the man does not earn fees enough to make up his salary he does not get more than his fees amount to. So there is the constant temptation to swell the business on the part of those officers who do not get enough fees to make up their salaries.

It is not the great cases out of which the fees come. It is the little cases. You take a criminal case, which takes a month or six weeks to try, and the district attorney gets only $10 if he loses it and $50 if he wins it. It is the little vexatious suits against poor and ignorant defendants out of which the fees come.

I am therefore an entire and enthusiastic convert to the proposition which I received originally with reluctance, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] does, that we should abolish the fee system for the salary system. I think I shall entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio in saying that the bills which the Judiciary Committee have reported ought to be taken up and dealt with on their merits, the views of the honorable Senator from Ohio in regard to the amount of salaries thoroughly considered by the Senate, and let us have all equal rights in legislation with the other House.

Mr. CHANDLER. The two Senators who last addressed the Senate, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], argued on different sides of the main question and are going to vote together upon the motion; that is to say, the Senator from Massachusetts believes that the district attorneys and marshals ought to have salaries, but that they ought not to be given them upon an appropriation bill, while the Senator from Ohio has opposed these provisions in the bill on the general proposition that there ought not to be legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. President, it is true that there ought not to be, as a general principle, and yet the Senator from Ohio knows that the most important legislation that has been accomplished in Congress has been put upon appropriation bills. Early in the present session the attention of both Houses was called to the enormous expenses of the United States courts, and it has seemed to be agreed by almost the unanimous consent of the other House and of the Senate that a system of salaries for those officers ought to be established. The House, following up that almost unanimous sentiment, has prepared a list of salaries and put it into this bill. The subject of the salaries has been considered by the Judiciary Committee and the Appropriations Committee of this body, and the list of salaries now stands in this bill. I think we ought to hold on to the reform that we have obtained. I think we ought to retain the provision as to salaries for marshals and district attorneys. The amendments that have been made in the Senate will come up for consideration in the conference with the House, and we shall then have accomplished a result at this session of Congress.

I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that even if these salaries are not exactly as they should be in all respects, Congress meets again within six months, and any anomaly can be corrected, whereas, I ask the Senator, suppose we strike these provisions out of the bill and the House concurs in erasing them, how long will it be before we shall have the district attorneys and the marshals of the United States placed upon salaries. It may be a year, it may be a half dozen years, and I have observed that the way to get anything you want to obtain in legislation is to get it when you can, and not be very earnestly in favor of it and at the same time in favor of securing what you want in some other way and at some other time.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from New Hampshire wish me to answer the question?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will answer any question the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to ask.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator asked me a question, and I rose to answer it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator, when will we get the reform if we do not get it now?

Mr. HOAR. Those two bills are at our gates, all reported. The Senator says it is very easy to alter the bill in a year if it is wrong, and that it is very difficult to get this legislation, both Houses being zealously in favor of it, unless we accept the provisions in the pending bill.

Those two bills are here in the ordinary course of legislation ready to be acted upon. I am willing to move to take them up to-morrow morning if these provisions are stricken out of the bill. Those bills are on the Calendar now. We can pass them and the other House can. If we pass them, we shall pass them on an equality with the other House. Now, as we put the provisions in the appropriation bill we put our head into the mouth of the other branch.

Mr. CHANDLER. No. The other House have given their salaries and we give our salaries, and they go into conference, and the question can be fairly settled by the conference committee.

So I agree with some things that both Senators have said, who differ with each other, and I differ from the votes which, differing with each other, both of them propose to give. I think we ought to hold on to these salary provisions and secure them now at this session of Congress.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am very glad that the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] remained after 4 o'clock, although he had agreed to leave promptly at that hour, in order that he might express his sentiments on the general proposition of the impropriety of placing important legislation upon appropriation bills. I concur in all the sentiments which he has expressed upon that point.

I wish to say a few brief words as to the history of this matter and its present status. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] introduced certain bills fixing salaries in place of fees for district attorneys and marshals. Those bills were before the Judiciary Committee. A subcommittee was appointed very promptly and was considering those very bills, and that committee was intending to present a report. In the meantime the House of Representatives, for some reason, no one knows what, concluded to place upon this appropriation bill the provisions there found, changing the whole law upon the subject and substantially embracing the provisions of the Vest bill.

Notwithstanding that fact, the Vest bills have been reported by the Judiciary Committee, containing these same provisions, and they are here upon our files. Immediately after the consideration of the Arkansas bill they can be taken up and passed, provided the Senate is in favor of the adoption of the salary principle. There is therefore no necessity for creating a vicious precedent. There is no necessity for putting on the appropriation bill provisions which it is said the Senate approves and which it has already been shown that the other House approves.

One or two Senators who have spoken have said that it is sometimes justifiable in great emergencies, and at other times when everybody concedes the propriety of certain legislation, and in the last moments of a session, by common consent, to place unobjectionable provisions upon an appropriation bill. Within those limitations it might be well to say that possibly no harm is done. I antagonize these provisions not because I have any particular opposition to them. I antagonize them on the first ground, that it is unnecessary to place them here. The two Vest bills have been reported. They can be amended here within the next forty-eight or fifty-six hours; they can be made exactly like the provisions in this bill, and they can be passed and go to the other House, and that House can act upon them. It can not be truthfully said that a House which almost unanimously passed the provisions upon the pending bill would refuse to act upon those bills.

Therefore, Mr. President, we are creating a bad precedent unnecessarily. We are doing a foolish thing without any cause for it. We are straining over legislation when there is no point to it. When we had our pleasant little discussion a few weeks ago on the subject of distributing the appropriation bills, the very point was made that the Appropriations Committee was the most important committee. It was denied. The point was made and attention directed to it that the most important provisions enacted by Congress were always to be found in appropriation bills. Whether they got there surreptitiously, whether they were put there deliberately, whether in the last hurried ending of a session they were put there, it matters not; they found their way there; they were there.

Sir, during the first forty years of the history of this Government there were no such things as amendments of this character upon appropriation bills. The first forty years of the history of this Government shows that our legislators religiously kept appropriation bills for appropriations. There never was any attempt to ingraft general legislation upon them. We may learn some wisdom from our fathers. Afterwards both bodies were more or less to blame for placing political legislation upon appropriation bills. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says the system is a pernicious one; the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says the system is a pernicious one; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] says the system is a bad one, and yet he is willing to tolerate it at this particular time for the sake of reform.

Let us see what the result of this thing will be. In the first place, there is a bad precedent, in that you have taken out this matter from the consideration of the very committee authorized by the House and the Senate to pass upon judicial questions. These provisions originated in the Appropriations Committee of the House. They were passed upon by the Appropriations Committee of this body. Now, what was done? To take the curse off, if I may use such a familiar phrase, for the purpose of exhibiting great courtesy to the Judiciary Committee, which we very much appreciated, the Appropriations Committee asked the Judiciary Committee to look over the appropriation bill concerning these provisions and to make suggestions. We could not well refuse.

We did go over the bill, and we made such suggestions as occurred to us; and out of courtesy to the committee we transmitted those amendments back to the Appropriations Committee. Nevertheless that is not the way to do business. That is not the proper way to legislate. The Judiciary Committee was entitled as a matter of propriety to this subject originally, and not as a mere matter of courtesy. They were reported. In transmitting them to the Appropriations Committee it was distinctly understood and was said in our committee that we were not committed to the propriety of placing those amendments on the appropriation bill. Every member of the committee reserved that question for himself. What did we do? At the same time we reported the Vest bills, which are here, properly reported, awaiting action.

Mr. President, is it necessary for me, when everybody concedes that the point I make is right, to multiply instances when great wrongs have been perpetrated in the history of this Government by making use of appropriation bills for general legislation? It has been done, sir, or attempted to be done, by both political parties. It is a wrong and vicious principle. It does not pay politically in the long run.

Let us go back in the history of this country. Look how some of the important amendments to the Federal elections law crept in on appropriation bills, put there in order to coerce the action of certain branches of the Government. Then what took place subsequently? Subsequently an effort was made to repeal those laws, and we have not forgotten the great contest had between both Houses of Congress and President Hayes. I have before me the veto of President Hayes on amendments to appropriation bills, amendments that got rid of what was known as the obnoxious Federal election laws, and he vetoed them. Sir, candor compels me to say that he properly vetoed them on the ground that they had no place in appropriation bills. Much as I desired at that time, much as the Democratic party desired, the repeal of those laws, that was not the way to accomplish it. I am free to say that if there ever was an occasion when it was proper to use an appropriation bill as a lever with which to accomplish great political results, that was one of them.

Every Senator knows it is wrong. Every Senator knows it is a vicious principle. Every Senator concedes all that has been so well said here by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Massachusetts, and yet we propose to do it again. Why at this stage of the session? It is not the close of the session. We have plenty of time to legislate. There is to be no financial legislation; there is to be no tariff legislation, and we have ample time to perfect those wise provisions, if they are wise, and therefore we have not any sort of an excuse for inaugurating a principle which some day or other will return to plague us.

Now, when the Senate is nearly equally divided, when our Populist friends hold the balance of power, is a good time, when neither party has the absolute control of the Senate, to stop the House of Representatives from resorting to this method of legislation. Merely because the Appropriations Committee, out of courtesy, sent the bill as respects these provisions to the Judiciary Committee does not change the situation. Let me say further that no criticism should be indulged in against the Appropriations Committee of the Senate. It is but fair to say that that committee did not place the provisions on the bill. As has been well stated, they were placed there by the other House, and the Appropriations Committee felt constrained to permit them to remain. Therefore the criticism which I have made is not directed against the Appropriations Committee of the Senate. They have tolerated the error; they have not sanctioned it. They have simply accepted the situation as it was presented by the House, and the House, in my judgment, ought not to have insisted upon them, because it is an unnecessary, an unwise, and a bad precedent. If these provisions meet with the views of both Houses, we can easily pass them in separate bills.

Let us see further what is the danger of this thing. If we disagree and a conference committee is appointed, not a member of the Judiciary Committee will be upon the conference committee. The Appropriations Committee take charge of that. What further takes place? Bear in mind, the Appropriations Committee have not adopted all the provisions of the other House. The Appropriations Committee have stricken out all the clauses in regard to United States commissioners, a very important matter. Some say they are desirable and others deny it. They are stricken out. We have no opportunity to amend them, because they are not before us. Some of us have certain views as to what United States commissioners should be compelled to do, as to what offices they should hold, and all that, but we are substantially and virtually powerless, because the committee have stricken them out and they are not before the Senate for amendment.

The bill goes to the other House. They nonconcur. Again the Appropriations Committee have charge of it, and they will agree or disagree to the provision in reference to United States commissioners. When the bill comes back there is no opportunity for amendment. Those who desire to amend the provisions relating to United States commissioners have no opportunity. It is gone. This simply illustrates the folly, the unwisdom, of attempting to put important judicial provisions, enacting new legislation, upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York whether striking out the provisions in relation to commissioners is not in part the action of the Judiciary Committee, of which the honorable Senator is a member?

Mr. HILL. Of course it is. That is not the question.

Mr. CULLOM. It is one of the facts, nevertheless.

Mr. HILL. We suggested that there ought not to be any legislation upon that question at all. It was stricken out. The bill goes to a conference committee. Possibly there ought to be amendments. If it is to be adopted at all, there ought to be amendments to it. We have had no opportunity to amend it. We can not do it. It has not been discussed in the Senate. The provisions have been stricken out absolutely, and thus the House has an unfair advantage over the Senate in that respect. If the matter had been brought up in a regular fee bill, in a regular judiciary bill, such as the Vest bill before us, then we could have gone over those items separately and considered them and made such amendments as were necessary.

I do not care so much about the pending bill. I have convictions upon this subject. I see over and over again a course pursued that is unwise, and every time we hear the old argument, "We will change it next time." The Senators constituting the Judiciary Committee will bear in mind that I suggested in our consultation that now is a good opportunity to stop this kind of legislation. Everybody considers that it is wrong, even in the Judiciary Committee. I do not think that even the Appropriations Committee cared about having this matter thrust upon them, for it was thrust upon them by the other House. They say, What are we to do? We will go back to the House and tell them the Senate will not agree to it. Shall we hazard this great appropriation bill? Yes; hazard it. There is no better time to hazard it than now. You have ample time to do it. You have been diligent, you have been prompt, at least this year, in presenting your appropriation bills, and there is plenty of time for negotiation.

Let me call your attention to another matter. We can not place new legislation upon appropriation bills. We are tied down by our rules. The other House can not do it, but they violate the rule. I hold in my hand the rules of the House of Representatives, and these new provisions which they have put on are in violation of their own rules. Yet so anxious were they for this great reform, that they rode over their own rules and placed those provisions upon this bill. And now it is said we must not strike it out. Why not? We are a coordinate branch of Congress. We have just as much right to legislate as has the House. The House can pass the bill in a separate form. Although the House has control of the Treasury of the country, although it has the right to originate revenue bills, it has not the sole power to originate bills of this character.

Further, I submit to the good sense of the Senate upon this matter, which is not a party question, but a question of propriety, a question of the orderly conduct of legislative business, why seek to create a precedent that will return some time to plague us? The general question of the propriety of changing the system of fees to a system of salaries, I am disposed to favor. There is a great deal to be said upon the other side. There is a great deal to be said upon some of the provisions which were so ably defended by the Senator from Illinois when attention was called to them. I refer to the provisions which allow the appointment of an almost unlimited number of deputy marshals. That is the effect of it. I fear it will increase the expenses of the United States Government. I am willing to try it and I am willing to vote for it, and I voted to report the two Vest bills. I am willing to take them up for consideration the moment the Arkansas bill is disposed of.

There is no necessity for placing these provisions in the present bill. What would be the result if we did not? I know there will be a struggle over it. The House will not insist upon it. If I were to predict, I would predict that the House would not insist upon it. We are clearly right, as right as if there were but one side to the argument, and the good sense of the House will assert itself.

Undoubtedly there has been in the past much excellent legislation placed upon appropriation bills. I do not think it was wise to do it. I recollect—it was only a year or so ago, in 1893 or 1894—when the whole system was changed in the matter of accounting in the Treasury Department and the other Departments of the Government. It was placed upon an appropriation bill. Then once in awhile there creeps in an objectionable feature. We woke up the other day to find that we could not ask for a second estimate for a public work to be done, because we had bound ourselves by an amendment put on an appropriation bill which nobody knew anything about and which had not been discussed in this Chamber. We found that we could not substantially ask for that information from one of the Departments of this Government without the consent of the President of the United States. The provision was put in on an appropriation bill. Public attention was not drawn to it, and every day we witness the farce—for it is nothing more or less—of a bill or a joint resolution being passed asking for a second estimate for public works, which has to go to the President of the United States. I speak thus of unwise things that have been done, and there have been wise things done, so far as they are intrinsically concerned. What I am objecting to is the vicious principle involved.

Mr. President, my attention has been called to this matter in other fields of labor. My views were expressed years ago in messages to the legislature of the State of New York. I was compelled in many instances to veto an entire appropriation bill because of objectionable, partisan, vicious legislation inserted upon it. I appealed to the people upon that question, and the last constitutional convention of our State amended the constitution, so that to-day it absolutely prohibits any sort of legislation upon appropriation bills. That is the right principle. Several of the State constitutions contain similar provisions. Public experience has demonstrated the wisdom of it.

We can not without great difficulty provide an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for anything—good, bad, or indifferent. It takes too long. But we can by a proper course here pursued adhere to orderly methods of legislation. It is for the benefit of both political parties, it is for the benefit of all sides of this Chamber, it is for the benefit of the whole people to confine appropriation bills to their legitimate purposes, and not to attempt to put in general legislation, not to attempt to change existing law, even though the amendments are good or are bad.

I see no answer to this proposition, and when Senators of such long experience as those who have risen upon the other side of the Chamber to-day, whose service in this Chamber numbers three or four terms and even more than that, say this is a wrong principle, I think those who have served less time in this body may well follow the principles they have laid down.

I do not suppose, as many Senators have left with the understanding that there would be no vote this evening upon the pending question—of course I do not desire to have a vote quite pressed this afternoon.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know of any understanding that the bill would not be disposed of this afternoon. I have heard nothing of it.

Mr. HILL. I did not speak of an understanding with the Senators. I say several Senators left with such an understanding.

Mr. CULLOM. They may have gone away. That is one thing.

Mr. HOAR. They are paired.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose they are paired if they have gone. The bill has now been before the Senate some three days or more, and I think we ought to dispose of it to-night.

Mr. HILL. I desire to have a full vote on this question.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we ought to dispose of the bill this afternoon, and I hope the Senator will allow us to come to a vote as soon as Senators get through with what they have to say.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to anyone else speaking; I am not going to move to adjourn; but I do not wish to have a vote taken to-night.

Mr. CULLOM. I will make a suggestion in the interest of accommodating members of the Senate as well as I can. I ask that it be unanimously agreed that immediately after the morning business to-morrow we shall take this bill up and vote at 2 o'clock. If the Senate will agree to dispose of it by 2 o'clock to-morrow, I would be willing that the Senate should now adjourn without further considering the bill to-day.

Mr. HILL. That would be all right, except that we can not tell what will come up as morning business. That is the difficulty about it.

Mr. CULLOM. I mean actual morning business, the introduction of petitions and bills and reports. If we agree to my suggestion, we can take up the bill soon after 12 o'clock.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator that we had nothing but routine morning business this morning, and it immediately gave rise to a discussion which took two hours.

Mr. CULLOM. We had more than mere routine morning business. We had the discussion and passage of a joint resolution.

Mr. HILL. It was the report of a committee, however, which was properly in order.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes; but it was within the power of the Senate to have refused to consider it this morning if it had chosen to do so. However that may be, if it should be understood by the Senate that to-morrow morning, without going into the discussion of measures such as resolutions, etc., or attempting to pass bills, but immediately after the presentation of petitions, memorials, bills, and reports from committees we take up this bill and dispose of it by 2 o'clock, I shall be entirely willing.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to disposing of the bill. I have no doubt we can do that, but I do not want any agreement to that effect; that is all. I have no purpose whatever of delaying the bill, however.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator agree that the Senate shall take a vote at 3 o'clock or sooner if there is no further discussion?

Mr. HILL. Certainly, at 3 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. At 3 o'clock.

Mr. HILL. It will not take even that time. One or two Senators have spoken to me who desire to say a few words, and I do not desire to foreclose them.

Mr. HOAR. Say not later than 3 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. Not later than 3 o'clock, if the discussion is concluded.

Mr. HILL. But the difficulty with a unanimous-consent agreement is that you are liable to have some other business come up, and if you——

Mr. CULLOM. Does the Senator from New York want to make any agreement?

Mr. HILL. I prefer not to; but I state to the Senate in all fairness that we expect to have a vote after very little more discussion. The point is that some Senator will rise and ask the Senate to consider some bill, and you have to be discourteous to him if you object. That is why I do not wish to enter into an agreement. That is all. Yet I want a full vote, and I want to have this bill disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that this question may be taken up, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], and disposed of at an hour to be agreed upon, with no intervening business to take the place of any proper discussion that may be had upon this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Say begin its consideration at twenty minutes after 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. And that the discussion shall go on. I desire myself to make some observations upon the bill, but do not wish to speak to-night. This being an appropriation bill, however, it ought certainly to be passed to-morrow. If we can now have some understanding as to any hour when we shall take a vote, it will be—it seems to me it would be—a wise thing to do.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to have an opportunity to offer one amendment in the Senate before the bill is finally acted upon. I do not want to be cut off by an agreement.

Mr. CULLOM. There will be no difficulty about that.

Mr. PLATT. I do not wish to be cut off by an agreement as to any hour for a vote. I wish to say now that in any agreement I may enter into——

Mr. ALLISON. Does the Senator's amendment relate to this matter?

Mr. PLATT. Not to this particular matter, but I refer to an amendment to the bill which will be in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. ALLEN. I was going to suggest to the Senator the propriety of fixing the hour at 4 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I am willing to agree to that if we can not dispose of it sooner. Say not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. ALLEN. Not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Upon the bill?

Mr. GORMAN. No; on this proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. Upon the final passage of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The final passage of the bill and amendments.

Mr. HILL. I do not think it will take until 4 o'clock, but I think it will expedite matters not to have an agreement.

Mr. CULLOM. It will expedite matters to have an agreement.

Mr. ALLEN. There is not the slightest disposition to delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. HILL. Not at all.

Mr. CULLOM. If we have no understanding we will get into the discussion of other matters, and a good share of the day will be passed before we shall get to the consideration of this bill, and we ought to get it through at as early a day as possible. I have been, I think, very patient about the matter; I have not undertaken to press anybody; I have accommodated the Senate in other matters as well as I could to keep Senators satisfied that they were having fair play. Now, if the Senate will agree that we shall vote at 4 o'clock to-morrow upon the bill——

Mr. ALLISON. And all amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. And all amendments, and take the bill up as early as possible in the morning, I think it ought to be satisfactory to the Senate. I ask that of the Senate.

Mr. HILL. I do not wish to have an agreement. It will be evident to-morrow why I do not wish to do it.

Mr. CULLOM. Then I can not——

Mr. HILL. I wish to bear witness to the Senator's extreme courtesy during the entire debate. I have not asked any special favors in regard to it that I know of, and I do not think the Senator could have cut me off if he had tried, though he has not tried. But there is no disposition whatever to delay action upon the bill. I am as anxious as he can possibly be to oblige our most patient friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], whose bill is the unfinished business.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not going to ask for any agreement—I can not in view of the remarks of the Senator from New York, as he indicates that he is not willing to make one—but I give notice that I shall ask to take up the bill early to-morrow, immediately after we meet and the morning business is disposed of.

Mr. HILL. I will cooperate with the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. COCKRELL. Say twenty minutes after 12 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope to get the bill up within twenty or thirty minutes after 12 o'clock.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. If I have the floor, I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 4254.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the bill is taken up, I will state that, if this matter is to be laid aside for the day, I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Minnesota should have consent to proceed to the consideration of his bill. I wish, however, if it has not already been done, that other amendments to the appropriation bill, aside from the amendments proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] might be concurred in.

Mr. CULLOM. They have been concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. Have all of the amendments been concurred in?

Mr. CULLOM. All of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in and disposed of except those involved in this proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. Then this is the only amendment pending?

Mr. CULLOM. Probably there are some other amendments which are liable to be offered.

Mr. ALLISON. Which will be offered?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I was not aware of that.

Mr. HILL. I can not hear what is going on, but I do not understand that any agreement is being made which will bind the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. No agreement whatever.

Mr. CULLOM. No agreement, I can assure the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. If there is, I want to be a party to it.

Mr. PLATT. Before the conclusion of the bill I shall ask once more to offer the amendment which was offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and ruled out of order. I think perhaps the point of order will not be made against it again.

DULUTH AND NORTH DAKOTA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. NELSON. I renew my request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4254) granting to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Red Lake Reservation until the consent of the Red Lake Indians shall be obtained thereto in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DECISIONS OF THE DISTRICT COURT OF APPEALS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2546) concerning the court of appeals in the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the decision of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia shall be final in all cases where the decision of a circuit court of appeals of the United States would have been final if the question involved in such decision had arisen in any State.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAST DEFENSES.

Mr. SQUIRE. I desire at this time to give notice that it is the desire of the Committee on Coast Defenses that the bill which has been reported to the Senate by that committee shall be taken up for consideration and acted upon at the earliest practicable moment. There is a great deal of interest manifested in the bill, I may say, throughout the country, and I have received a great many letters and petitions on the subject. The people feel that it is right and proper that the question shall come up at this session of Congress and at an early day. They are very anxious to have the matter considered. I therefore trust that there will be a disposition on the part of Senators to allow the bill to be taken up as soon as practicable.

I know that there are some other matters already on the Calendar which are preferred. The Cuban question is preferred; the question as to the Senator from Delaware is preferred, and, I believe, also the question of——

Mr. CULLOM. And appropriation bills.

Mr. SQUIRE. Appropriation bills, of course, are preferred. I I suppose that is the rule here. In addition to that, I understand the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has a bill which he has obtained the consent of the Senate shall be regarded as the unfinished business. I have no disposition to displace that bill. At the same time I feel that the great importance of the question of coast defenses warrants me in pressing it upon the attention of the Senate, and that I should not be justified in waiting an undue length of time before asking the Senate to consider the bill.

DISTRICT COURT OF ALASKA.

Mr. VILAS. I ask consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2346) to prescribe the times and places of holding the district court of the United States in and for the District of Alaska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the regular terms of the district court of the United States in and for the District of Alaska shall be held at Sitka on the third Monday in May and at Juneau on the last Monday in March and the second Monday in November,

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN CHEYENNE, BOISE CITY, AND HELENA.

Mr. MANTLE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 656) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to embarrass the passage of the bill, but I think the Senator from Montana should state the special reasons—I presume there are some—why these three public buildings are coupled in one bill instead, as in the ordinary course, of being placed in three bills separate from each other. Of course every Senator understands that the practice of putting together in one bill several public buildings would lead to great abuse and logrolling in legislation. There would be a temptation to do that. Appropriations for public buildings ought to be kept, as they always have been in the practice of the Senate, distinct, unless there be some special reason for uniting them. If there be such reason, it ought to be stated when the bill is under consideration.

Mr. MANTLE. I desire to state, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that the reason why these localities are coupled together in the pending bill is that they were united in a former bill which is now a law, and which was, I believe, originally passed in pursuance of a general law providing for the erection of public buildings at the capitals of the States. These three towns were put together in the former law, and hence they are kept together in this bill.

Mr. HOAR. This relates to the capitals of the three States which came in together?

Mr. MANTLE. Yes; Montana, Wyoming, and Idaho. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], I believe, originally introduced this bill, and perhaps he can explain it.

Mr. HOAR. As I said, I do not wish to antagonize or embarrass or delay the passage of the bill, but I want to have clearly and sharply stated the reason why several cities are appropriated for in one bill, so that it shall not be made a precedent hereafter.

Mr. DUBOIS. With the consent of the Senator from Montana, I believe I can make the matter plain to the Senator from Massachusetts. At the last session of Congress the Committees on Appropriations of the House and of the Senate deemed it wise and proper to give to each one of those new States a public building at its capital, inasmuch as there was no public building in any one of those States. The reasons were so plain that there was no objection.

All the Federal officers are in the capital cities, and as these three States were the only States which did not have public buildings, they were coupled together and put in an appropriation act.

Mr. HOAR. This is a bill supplemental to that act?

Mr. DUBOIS. Entirely. The bill in that shape passed Congress.

Mr. MANTLE. I desire to state, in addition to what has been said by the Senator from Idaho——

Mr. COCKRELL. How much will the bill increase the limit of cost of each of those buildings?

Mr. MANTLE. It will increase the limit of cost of the public building at Boise City, Idaho, $50,000; at Cheyenne, Wyo., $100,000; and at Helena, the capital of Montana, $150,000. There are reports from the Department, accompanying the bill, showing the necessity for this increase of the amounts, inasmuch as larger buildings are required to accommodate the public necessities in those States. The bill was reported favorably by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The amendment reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 25, after the word "including," it is proposed to strike out the words "the site"; in line 29, after the word "hundred," to strike out "and fifty"; in line 30, after the word "and," to strike out "five" and insert "three"; and in line 32, after the word "Montana," to insert "exclusive of the cost of the sites therefor"; so as to read:

Neither of said sites shall cost in excess of $20,000, and neither of said buildings, each of which shall be fireproof, shall cost, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, fireproof vaults, and approaches, complete, in excess of the sum of $250,000 for the building at Cheyenne, the capital of Wyoming; $200,000 for the building at Boise City, the capital of Idaho, and $300,000 for the building at the city of Helena, the capital of Montana, exclusive of the cost of the sites therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES LINSKEY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. For what purpose does the Senator desire me to yield?

Mr. BROWN. I wish to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which has once passed the Senate in a different form. A similar bill having passed the other House; I wish to ask the Senate to pass the House measure. It will take but a second. If I state the reason I think the Senator will yield.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. BROWN. On March 2 the Senate passed a bill, which I hold in my hand, Senate bill No. 680, which is word for word the bill passed by the House, No. 1861, which has come over to the Senate; but there was no allusion to its being the same bill. Now, I ask that the House bill, as such, may be passed, as on comparison I find it to be the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks for the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 1861) for the relief of James Linskey from the operations of the act restricting the ownership of real estate in the Territories and the District of Columbia to American citizens.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I now renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 27, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 26, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

JAMES DUKE.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 572) for the relief of James Duke.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the naval record of James Duke, who enlisted in the United States Navy February 21, 1862, and served as a first-class fireman on board the Baron de Kalb and Maria Denning up to July 6, 1863, by removing the charge of desertion from the record and granting him an honorable discharge.

SEC. 2. That upon the correction of the naval record of the said James Duke as aforesaid the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the said Duke or his legal representatives, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the pay and allowances of a first-class fireman from the 21st day of February, 1862, to the 6th day of July, 1863.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out section 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OTJEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

The bill (S. 2610) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the use of one-horse cars within the limits of the city of Washington after the 1st day of January, 1893, and for other purposes," approved July 29, 1892—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. 1725) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River at the city of Alexandria, La.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The bill (S. 923) for the relief of Irving W. Stanton—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 1796) making an appropriation for a reconnoissance of the mouths of Yukon River, in Alaska—to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (S. 314) for the relief of Eunice Tripler, widow of Charles S. Tripler—to the Committee on Claims.

CURRENCY COMMISSION.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have read the resolution which I send to the desk, and that it be printed in the RECORD and referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, and that the same be printed in the RECORD and referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, in view of the present inadequate banking and currency system, it is desirable that Congress have the aid of such recommendations as a non-partisan commission of experts might be able to offer regarding needed changes:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President is hereby authorized to appoint nine citizens, eminent in trade, political economy, and banking, to act with the Comptroller of the Currency, as such commission, and that the said commission be requested to report its conclusions and recommendations to Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing the resolution in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

SEWER ON PERMANENT RESERVATION AT HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 2265) to provide for reimbursement of the expense of constructing a sewer upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Albert B. Gaines, S. H. Stitt, and A. S. Garnett, of Hot Springs, Ark.; S. W. Fordyce, of St. Louis, Mo., and Charles B. Platt, of the city of New York, out of any money under his control derived from leases of bath-house sites and from the sale of lots on the Hot Springs Reservation, Ark., and available for the protection and improvement of said reservation, the sum of $1,421.18, in reimbursement of the amount actually expended by said persons in the construction of a sewer upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. MEIKLEJOHN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2265) to provide for reimbursement of the expense of constructing a sewer upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark., respectfully submit the following unanimous report, and recommend the passage of the bill:

The line of sewer pipe, repayment of the cost of which is provided in the bill, was constructed at the expense of the beneficiaries therein named in August, 1886. It extends for a distance of 1,550 linear feet upon the front of the permanent Hot Springs Reservation, and provides the only outlet for sewage from the Army and Navy Hospital and from the Arlington Hotel and bath houses occupying ground leased by the Government, by which is created the fund applicable by law to the protection and improvement of the reservation, and out of which it is proposed to make payment for this sewer.

At the time the sewer was laid the Government, under the direction of the Department of the Interior, had in progress the improvement of the creek which runs through the principal street of the city of Hot Springs by confining its waters between arched walls of masonry, affording an opportunity of laying the sewer with the least excavation and consequently at the lowest cost.

The plan under which the creek improvement was being done contemplated the emptying of the sewage of the city into the creek, a course which was universally condemned by the physicians of Hot Springs and competent engineers as unsanitary and injurious to the healthfulness of the city. A petition was addressed to the Department of the Interior, praying that the Government would lay this sewer, to which the Department replied that it could not then be determined whether the fund available for the work in progress would be sufficient to provide payment for this sewer; that the Department was prohibited from involving the Government in any contract in excess of the amount available, but that if the citizens of Hot Springs thought it advisable to take advantage of the opportunity before the filling was done along the creek work to lay the sewer, under the supervision of the superintendent of the reservation, there would be no objection interposed.

The sewer was laid in pursuance of this permission, and the cost of it was defrayed by the beneficiaries named in the bill.

We submit herewith a copy of a report of the Secretary of the Interior, from which it appears that the Department is satisfied "that the laying of the sewer was a necessity and that the Government was the principal beneficiary under the improvement," and that the Department "desired to allow a reasonable sum in reimbursement of the expenditure out of the Hot Springs Reservation fund, which was sufficient for the purpose," but that, upon referring the matter to the Comptroller of the Treasury, that officer had decided that payment could not legally be made.

The committee do not concur in the view of the Secretary of the Interior that an amount less than the cost of the sewer should be allowed these claimants. His recommendation is based upon an opinion of the present superintendent of the reservation, to the effect that while the cost of the sewer, as evidenced by the vouchers in 1886 appears to be correct, the work could probably be done now at less expense.

We find, however, that in forwarding to the Department the account and vouchers for this work October 11, 1886, the then superintendent of the reservation, Gen. Charles W. Field, under whose supervision the sewer had been laid as required by the Department, stated that "the work appears to have been done with as much economy as is consistent with durability and efficient service," and, it may be added, he recommended that the Government assume the ownership and control of it and reimburse the projectors for their outlay.

In order to satisfy ourselves upon this point the committee have carefully examined the original account and vouchers on file in the Interior Department. The principal items are for the sewer pipe (purchased directly from manufacturers, in the city of St. Louis), freight thereon to Hot Springs, drayage, labor in laying the sewer, and other small items incidental to work of this character, all at prices which seem to be reasonable.

We therefore report the bill favorably without amendment and recommend its passage.

FEBRUARY 14, 1896.

SIR: Your letter has been received, inclosing, with request for report thereon, House bill No. 2265 (Fifty-fourth Congress, first session), "to provide for reimbursement of expense of constructing a sewer upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark."

In response thereto, I have the honor to state that on the 11th of October, 1886, the then superintendent of the Hot Springs Reservation transmitted to the Department, with favorable recommendation, the application of A. B. Gaines, of Hot Springs, Ark., for reimbursement to him of the sum of $1,421.18 as expenses incurred in the laying of a 10-inch vitrified earthen sewer pipe along the front of the permanent reservation from Reserve avenue to Fountain street, a distance of 1,550 feet, together with the original vouchers for material and pay rolls for the labor used in connection with the work.

Under date of 21st of January, 1887, the Department considered the application, and declined to authorize the payment of any portion of the account presented by Mr. Gaines, for the reason that there was no money belonging to the Hot Springs Reservation fund available for such purpose.

In August of 1895 Mr. Gaines renewed his application for reimbursement of the money expended in laying the sewer pipe in question. The Department, having satisfied itself that the laying of this sewer was a necessity and that the Government was the principal beneficiary under the improvement, advised the Comptroller of the Treasury, under date of August 29, 1895, of its desire to allow applicant a reasonable sum in reimbursement of the expenditure in the matter from the Hot Springs Reservation fund, which was then sufficient for the purpose, provided payment could be made therefrom, and requested his opinion as to the propriety of the proposed allowance.

Under date of September 18, 1895, the Acting Comptroller decided that the Department could not, under the law, reimburse Mr. Gaines for the expense incurred in the laying of the sewer in question.

The present superintendent of the Hot Springs Reservation, to whom the bill under consideration was referred, reports that from a thorough investigation it appears that the sewer was laid across the reservation front as a connecting link between the Hot Springs sewerage system, at that time being laid by the city both north and south of it, and that it is now being extensively used by the Arlington Hotel, all the bath houses on the permanent reservation, and the Army and Navy Hospital. The cost of the sewer, as evidenced by the vouchers, etc., in 1886, appears to be correct as to material and labor at that time, but, he adds, it seems to have been expensively constructed, and expresses the opinion that such a sewer could be laid now for from 50 to 65 cents per foot.

Upon careful consideration of the matter, the Department is of the opinion that 60 cents a foot would be a reasonable sum to pay for the laying of the sewer in question, and have to suggest that the bill be amended by substituting $930 for $1,421.18 therein.

In this connection it is proper to add that the records of the Department fail to indicate that any of the beneficiaries specified in the bill, other than Mr. Gaines, have ever presented any claim for reimbursement for the expenditure in question.

There are transmitted herewith for your information copies of such papers from the files and records of the Department as bear upon the subject-matter of the claim.

Very respectfully, HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN F. LACEY,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what became of the report of the Secretary of the Interior that is referred to in that report?

Mr. LITTLE. It is set out in the report.

Mr. LOUD. There is so much confusion that I did not hear it read.

Mr. LITTLE. A copy of the Secretary's letter accompanies the report. I will state to my friend that the situation in this matter is this: A few years ago the Government undertook to bridge in the Hot Springs Creek, which runs down the main street, dividing the east reservation from the west reservation on the main street of the city. The east side of the reservation is the Government's permanent reservation, upon which are situated the bath houses, the Arlington Hotel, and Army and Navy Hospital. While they were bridging in this creek it was thought necessary to lay a sewer along the reserve side of the creek. The city laid a sewer on the opposite side, and this was laid to connect the reservation with the sewerage system of the city. This was done under the supervision of General Field, the superintendent of the reservation at that time. That could not be contracted for at that time, because the Government had no reservation funds on hand; but now there is ample money on hand of the reservation funds. This is not an appropriation by the Government, but the reimbursement of these citizens, who went down into their own pockets for the benefit of the Government and the city.

Mr. LOUD. What does the Secretary recommend?

Mr. LITTLE. He recommends the payment of $930; but the committee disagree with him. The committee have examined the vouchers and the receipts for the different items and had a detailed statement of the expense. The Secretary is of the opinion that it could now be done at less expense. General Field, the superintendent who supervised the work, stated: "The work appears to have been done with as much economy as consistent with durability and efficient service." And the committee recommend the reimbursement of the projectors for their outlay without interest.

Mr. LOUD. How is it that the Government did not take it up? Is not this private work that the private citizens wanted to do?

Mr. LITTLE. This was done by the citizens, but it was done under the supervision of Government officials there, because it was absolutely necessary, and solely for the direct benefit of the Government property.

Mr. LOUD. That is, the Government did not stop them?

Mr. LITTLE. The Government officials supervised the work.

Mr. LOUD. I think that you had better accept the amount that the Secretary recommends.

Mr. LITTLE. I think it ought to be the full amount of the cost expended by these good citizens.

Mr. LOUD. What is the amount?

Mr. LITTLE. It amounts to $1,421, and it would come out of these reservation funds. It is for the construction of this sewer which connected the east side reservation with all the bath houses, the national hospital, and the Arlington Hotel, which pays a heavy lease to the Government, and it is simply a reimbursement out of this fund derived from these leases.

Mr. LOUD. I understand; but do you not think in a case of this character it is wise to confine ourselves to the Secretary's recommendation?

Mr. LITTLE. I think not. I think it is best to follow the recommendation of the committee and do right. The present superintendent reported that the sewer could be more cheaply constructed now than the figures at which it was originally constructed, and the Secretary made his recommendation upon that report. One superintendent, the one who was superintendent at the time the sewer was constructed, the one who supervised the work, reported that it was done as economically as consistent with durability. The other reports that it can be done more cheaply now.

He says this: "The work appears to have been done with as much economy as is consistent with durability and efficient service," and it may be added he recommended that "the Government assume the ownership and control of it and reimburse the projectors for their outlay."

That is the statement of General Field, who was on the ground and at the time superintendent of the reservation.

Mr. LOUD. Let us hear what the Secretary says.

Mr. LITTLE. The Secretary says this:

The present superintendent of the Hot Springs Reservation, to whom the bill under consideration was referred, reports that from a thorough investigation it appears that the sewer was laid across the reservation front as a connecting link between the Hot Springs sewerage system, at that time being laid by the city both north and south of it, and that it is now being extensively used by the Arlington Hotel, all the bath houses on the permanent reservation, and the Army and Navy Hospital. The cost of the sewer, as evidenced by the vouchers, etc., in 1886, appears to be correct as to material and labor at that time, but, he adds, it seems to have been expensively constructed, and expresses the opinion that such a sewer could be laid now for from 50 to 65 cents per foot.

Upon careful consideration of the matter the Department is of the opinion that 60 cents a foot would be a reasonable sum to pay for the laying of the sewer in question, and have to suggest that the bill be amended by substituting $930 for $1,421.18 therein.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will accept $930 I shall not object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. After this money is paid who will own this sewer?

Mr. LITTLE. The Government.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The bill does not so state.

Mr. LITTLE. But the sewer is on the permanent reservation, and the courts have decided oftentimes that improvements of this character upon Government reservations belong to the Government. The sewer is away down in the ground, and of course nobody could go and tear up the ground on the permanent reservation without the consent of the Government. The Department makes no point of that kind. I hope the gentleman will not object to this bill. These men have lain out of their money for more than eight years, and the Government has had the benefit of this sewer during all that time. They ask no interest, only the principal.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will accept $930 I shall not object.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, I suppose I shall have to accept it, though I shall be very sorry to do so. Will the gentleman allow us to take a vote on the amendment?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this bill, it proposes to pay about $500 more than the Secretary of the Interior recommends.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir; some $500 more.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the reason for paying more than the Secretary recommends?

Mr. LITTLE. I have explained that fully to my friend from California [Mr. LOUD], but I suppose the gentleman from Maine did not hear the explanation.

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not hear the colloquy.

Mr. LITTLE. The present superintendent of the reservation wrote a letter to the Secretary stating that it appears the sewer was expensively constructed and that it could now be constructed for a less sum per foot, but General Field, who was on the ground at the time, reported that it was built as reasonably as it could have been built at that time, and we have his statement to that effect. The vouchers for the outlay are on file, accounting for every cent of the money. The committee had those vouchers before them, and after examining them fully, the committee decided that these men ought to have the amount that they expended in constructing the sewer. The Government has had the use of the sewer for more than eight years, and the reason it has not been paid for before is that until very recently there has been no surplus in the reservation fund.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think if we pay what the Secretary recommends that is all we ought to do.

Mr. LITTLE. But the Government has had the use of the sewer during all this time.

Mr. DINGLEY. But it was built by private individuals for their own benefit.

Mr. LITTLE. Not at all. There is not a private individual who can use it. It is on the permanent reservation. It is used by the hotels and the bath houses; but the Government is collecting rent for those houses, and no individual uses this sewer. There is no private establishment on that side of the avenue.

Mr. DINGLEY. Have the committee unanimously recommended the payment of an amount above that which is recommended by the Department?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes, sir; they made the recommendation after full discussion. My friend from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] can explain that.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the theory of the Interior Department was that this was practically a purchase of the sewer at the present time, and that therefore we ought to give only what it would cost to construct it at this time——

Mr. LOUD. I think the gentleman misinterprets the language of the Secretary, if I can understand English. He says it would cost 40 cents per foot at this time, but he proposes to allow 60 cents.

Mr. LACEY. No; he says the cost would be from 50 to 65 cents, and he strikes an average at 60 cents.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to insist upon my objection, unless the gentleman will accept $930.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, there was a misunderstanding between the gentleman and myself. I thought he was going to offer his proposition as an amendment and have a vote upon it. But if he insists I shall have to accept the $930.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD offered an amendment, as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 11, page 1, the following words: "One thousand four hundred and twenty-one," and also the words "eighteen cents," and insert the words "nine hundred and thirty" before the word "dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

GULF, COLORADO AND SANTA FE RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. FISCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7170) to grant the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railroad Company the right to acquire depot grounds at the town of Davis, Tishomingo County, Chickasaw Nation, Ind. T.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railroad Company, operating a railroad in the Indian Territory, may acquire such ground as may be necessary for depot, yards, sidings, and such other railway purposes as may be necessary at the town of Davis, in Tishomingo County, Chickasaw Nation, in the Indian Territory. But before taking possession of and using such lands the railroad company shall deposit with the treasury of the Chickasaw Nation compensation in cash at the rate of $25 per acre: Provided, That if said tribe shall not be satisfied with the compensation herein provided, the amount to be paid by said railroad company to said tribe shall be ascertained in the same manner as is prescribed by section 2 of this act with respect to compensation to be paid individual occupants on any land so taken.

SEC. 2. That when the railroad seeks to establish the depot on the land of individual occupants, and where the matter can not be amicably settled between the railroad company and said individual occupants, the company may apply to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall thereupon appoint three disinterested referees, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe before competent authority an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their awards. In case the referees can not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the United States district court of the district in which said land is situated, where the case shall be tried de novo. When proceedings have been commenced in court the railroad company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of such depot, with the necessary tracks. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are actually engaged in the trial of any case submitted to them under this act, with mileage of 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the courts of said nation, and all costs, including compensation of the referees, shall be made a part of the award and be paid by said railroad company.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FISCHER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SPECULATING IN CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. HENDRICK. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6834) to prevent the purchasing of or speculating in claims against the Federal Government by United States officers.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any United States marshal or deputy marshal, or any clerk or deputy clerk of any court of the United States or of any Territory thereof, or any United States attorney or assistant attorney, or any United States judge, or United States commissioner, or other person holding any office, employment, or position of trust or profit under the Government of the United States to purchase, either directly or indirectly, any witness fee or claim, or the fee or claim of any juror, or the fee or claim of any deputy marshal, or the fee or claim of any other person whatsoever against the United States Government.

SEC. 2. That any person who shall be guilty of a violation of the first section of this bill shall be liable to an indictment by the grand jury of the United States, and, upon conviction, shall be fined in any sum of not less than fifty nor more than five thousand dollars, and final judgment against the defendant shall ipso facto operate as a removal of the person convicted and render his office or position vacant.

SEC. 3. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this bill are hereby repealed.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6834) to prevent the purchasing of or speculating in claims against the Federal Government by United States officers, recommend its passage.

The main abuse against which this bill is aimed is the purchase by officers of the courts of witness fees at much less than their face value, and thereby not only are the witnesses taken advantage of and deprived of their proper compensation, but inducement is created for the officers to promote unnecessary litigation. There are many other cases where the present practice is pernicious which this bill would remedy, and the few possible cases where it might work hardship are deemed by the committee insignificant compared with those where its operation would be beneficial.

Mr. GROSVENOR. On account of confusion in the Hall I was unable to hear either the bill or the report. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HENDRICK] will state the effect of the bill.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the gentleman from Kentucky will make an explanation.

Mr. HENDRICK. Mr. Speaker, under the law as it now stands there is nothing to prohibit speculation in claims against the United States Government by officers of the Government; and this privilege, which arises from a lack of wholesome legislation, has been very much abused. The Attorney-General called my attention to the defect in the existing law, and after I had drafted this bill I submitted it to his inspection. After examining it, he has recommended its passage.

A few weeks ago my attention was called to a case in which one marshal had under his direction more than 200 deputies and bought up their claims at 50 cents on the dollar, and then put them in against the Government at 100 cents on the dollar. This man, although he went into office a very poor man and has held office only a short time, is now considered wealthy. He was formerly supposed to need the services of 200 deputies, but has now only 12, as I am informed, and the work is done as efficiently as when he had 200.

Anyone can see at a glance the door which is now wide open to dishonest officials who may wish to speculate in claims against the Government. This bill is intended to cut off that character of speculation, and to close the door to temptations and fraud.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I disapprove some of the provisions of the bill, but I do not wish to kill it by my mere objection.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the bill is before the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, my objection to this bill is based particularly upon the penalty provided in the second section. I would not advise such a bill as this in any event. It is an attempt to make the Government a sort of guardian over the conduct of all its officers. It is a step in the direction of that patriarchal tendency of the times, the idea of which seems to be that the Government shall impose disabilities and restrictions upon two classes of citizens—one, officeholders of a certain kind; the other, persons who happen to have claims against the Government for fees. But my principal point against the bill is that it provides a punishment by degrading the official incumbent from office. I doubt the constitutionality of that provision. When a man holding official position is charged with having bought a claim for witness fees, I doubt whether he is not entitled to have that fact tried and ascertained before the forfeiture of his official position.

Mr. HENDRICK. If the gentleman will notice closely the language of the bill, he will see that the removal from office is only to occur after the party has been indicted and convicted.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that perfectly. But, sir, is it not a pretty serious business to inflict a penalty in this way? There may be a witness who has testified in a certain case and who has not money enough to go home on. We do not make our appropriations for these matters with such accuracy as always leaves money in the registry of the courts for the payment of such claims. Over and over again I have known cases in the courts of the country where there was no money to pay jurors or witnesses.

Now, suppose the case of a witness who, summoned by the compulsory power of the Government, spends all the money he has in traveling to the place where the court is held. Having no money to return, he goes in his extremity to a Federal office-holder, who advances him, we will suppose, the entire amount of the fees and puts the certificate in his pocket. For thus doing, a judge of the United States court appointed for life, or a marshal, or a district attorney, would, under this bill, be degraded from office. For what reason?

Mr. HENDRICK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: If a United States marshal, for instance, does not wish to impose on the witness or to speculate on his necessities, the claim against the Government being perfectly good, can not the officer take out the money and hand it over to this witness? This bill merely prohibits the purchasing or speculating in such claims.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is a broad, sweeping proposition.

Mr. HENDRICK. Let me ask the gentleman this fourth question: Does he not think the existing evil is greater than the one suggested by him? It is understood that in some cases hundreds of witnesses who know very little about the case in controversy are summoned before United States commissioners and courts for the simple purpose of enabling some officer of the court to buy up their claims or fees, and that such claims to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars are purchased in that way and put in against the Government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Never try to right a wrong by another wrong. Never try to right an irregularity of this character by using the power of the Government in a manner indescribably oppressive. The bill introduced here by the Committee on the Judiciary, which is now a part of one of our annual appropriation bills, undertakes to remedy that evil; a very wise provision, and will go a long way toward accomplishing the desired end. It strikes at all of these attempts to pile up cases for the purpose of speculation. May I ask what committee this bill comes from?

Mr. HENDRICK. From the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is said, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on the Judiciary are the authors of this bill; but it is, I must say, a most astonishing piece of legislation—the most astonishing that I have ever seen in my life. If we are going to do this, if Congress is going to begin to undertake to control the contracting power of the citizens of this Government; if it is to discriminate against a man as to one class of claims and forbid him from selling or purchasing them under any circumstances, it strikes me that we are entering upon a very broad field, one that is peculiar, as far as I am aware, averse to our system of government, and I doubt very much its legality.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, in section 2 of the bill, all after the word "dollars," in the fifth line, on the second page, down to the end of the section, the following words:

And final judgment against a defendant shall ipso facto operate as the removal of the person convicted and render his office or position vacant.

I move to strike those words out, after "dollars," in the fifth line.

Mr. HENDRICK. If the gentleman from Maine will permit me, I wish to say that as originally drafted this bill did not contain the words that he offers to strike out. But the words he proposes now to strike from the bill were put on as an amendment at the suggestion of the Attorney-General, and the committee considered them on his recommendation. Here is a letter from the Attorney-General which suggests the amendment, and the gentleman can read it if he desires to do so.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me that an officer who has been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate should scarcely be dealt with in this manner. It seems hardly desirable that, in the case of a person so appointed, who has been convicted of advancing money for or purchasing the claim of a witness in order that he may return home, that he shall be punished not only by fine and imprisonment, but ipso facto that it should vacate his office. It seems to me that it is going a little too far.

Mr. HENDRICK. I think the gentleman will agree with me as a lawyer that if a party simply advances money to a witness or to another person it would not be a violation of the law. This provides for the punishment of persons who speculate in such claims.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no pride or special interest in the bill, but if the gentleman will read the letter from the Attorney-General which I hold in my hand he will discover that the privilege to buy or speculate in these claims is very much abused. Now, if you will permit me I will send to the desk——

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman will read the letter. It is a very severe punishment, it seems to me, and we would like to have all the information available upon the subject.

Mr. HENDRICK. The Attorney-General in his letter uses this language:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of February 8, 1896, inclosing me a copy of the bill H. R 6834 entitled "A bill to prevent the purchasing of or speculating in claims against the Federal Government by United States officers."

So far as I know, the only law on the subject is Revised Statutes, section 3477, which makes unlawful all transfers and assignments of any claim upon the United States, etc., except under certain formalities for allowance and issuing of warrant. For some reason this law does not appear to have been greatly honored in the observance.

As the evil at which your bill is aimed is widespread and corrupting, I think it should be passed, with some modifications. For instance, I think the enumeration of officers in the first section is unnecessary, and unnecessary enumeration is always dangerous, raising, as it does, the risk of limitation of the general language which follows to things of the same class as those specified under the application of the rule noscitur a sociis. I would leave the enumeration of claims stand as it is, but would change the general clause at the end of the section so as to limit it to claims arising in any way out of the administration of justice, if, as I presume from the general tenor of your bill, it is that class of claims only at which you aim.

I also suggest that in lines 5 and 6, second page, in lieu of the words "and shall in addition thereto be removed," you insert the words "and final judgment shall ipso facto operate as a removal of the person convicted."

Very respectfully,

JUDSON HARMON,
Attorney-General.

Hon. JOHN K. HENDRICK,
House of Representatives.

The section of the statute referred to by the Attorney-General is as follows:

SEC. 3477. All transfers and assignments made of any claim upon the United States, or of any part or share thereof or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim or of any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless they are freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such a claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof. Such transfers, assignments, and powers of attorney must recite the warrant for payment, and must be acknowledged by the person making them before an officer having authority to take acknowledgments of deeds, and shall be certified by the officer, and it must appear by the certificate that the officer, at the time of the acknowledgment, read and fully explained the transfer, assignment, or warrant of attorney to the person acknowledging the same.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Does this bill provide the amendment suggested in the Attorney-General's letter?

Mr. HENDRICK. Yes, sir; the bill is now drawn as suggested, and has been considered by the Judiciary Committee and so recommended for adoption.

Now, I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine that we have the same law in Kentucky, which has worked well there, and we were absolutely compelled to put such a law upon the statute books and cut off this abuse. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] to say the same law prevails there.

Mr. DINGLEY. It strikes me as legislation of a very extraordinary character, when it proposes not only to fine and imprison a man in a matter of this kind, who might under some circumstances have an ample defense, but also to make the conviction an absolute vacation of an office where the officer has been nominated by the President and confirmed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It struck me that it was going further than was necessary to secure the remedy. Of course the power of removal is with the President at any time; but if the Committee on the Judiciary have carefully examined this matter and think that the evil is so serious that a penalty going to this extreme should be adopted, why, I do not desire to make any suggestion in the matter. It seems to me, however, to be very severe.

Mr. HENDRICK. Did the gentleman hear my statement of a certain case——

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, I can imagine that there might be an exceptional case which was very serious; but I can imagine that there would be a very large number of cases that would be of minor importance. I should think that a penalty of fine and imprisonment would be sufficient.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. If this is an evil, why not stop it by the exact process by which we prevent the speculation in all other classes of Government claims, to wit, simply putting a half dozen lines or less into the statute relating to these fees, saying they shall be paid by the proper officer to no person except the person to whom the certificate is issued. In that way you have the whole matter under control without going into this sort of thing.

Mr. HENDRICK. If the gentleman from Ohio will read the section referred to by the Attorney-General, section 3477, he will discover that we virtually have that law upon the statute books now; but the Attorney-General says it is more honored in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That shows that we do not need any more legislation; for whenever you have got up to the maximum point where a law can be enforced and go beyond that maximum point, that is a time in a free country to stop legislation on that question.

I should like to suggest another thing to the gentleman. This law, in my judgment, is wholly unconstitutional. It does not give to every citizen of the State the equal protection of the law, which is the fundamental principle of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. Just at this time there is in this country a long line of cases, which have been decided one way in the State of Indiana, but which have been decided the other way in Illinois, Missouri,

West Virginia, and thus far in Ohio. They go to the question of the power of the legislative department of the Government to say that a laborer upon a certain kind of work shall not contract to take his pay in checks or orders upon the store, while every other kind of laborer may sell his labor at any price he sees fit. That system of legislation has been denounced in Massachusetts and all over the country, with the exception of one State. Now, here is an attempt in the same line. It is to say that I, holding a claim against the Government for a bushel of wheat or a barrel of pork, may sell my claim against the Government to whomsoever I please; but that if I sell my claim, just as honestly earned, for a fee as a witness, that the party who buys it, if he happens to be a Federal officer, shall be fined and degraded from his office, I say it is a plain innovation upon every principle of legislative power, and that is all I care about it. I have no interest in it, but simply do not want this House of Representatives to pass that kind of legislation.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my amendment. It appears that the Judiciary Committee have examined this matter and have reached the conclusion that the bill should remain in its present form. Therefore I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I renew the amendment. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that we do not want to enter upon this unusual and arbitrary character of legislation without due consideration. I have the greatest respect and admiration for the distinguished lawyers who compose our Committee on the Judiciary; but you will recollect that most of the bills that have been brought in during the present session by that committee have not been brought in in a judicial manner. We had the anti-Fitzsimmons-Maher bill. We had a bill brought in here, reported favorably but informally by the Committee on the Judiciary and passed in a few minutes, the purpose of the bill being to stop a prize fight. Was the prize fight stopped? We passed the bill hastily and in my opinion improperly, without due consideration. It was a bill to control prize fights throughout all the Territories and in the District of Columbia. It was an important measure, and yet, as in the case of all special legislation, it did not achieve the end desired. The prize fight went on, and the Texas Rangers drew off and looked on while the parties crossed the border and conducted the fight in Mexico.

Mr. MAHON. But there was no fight in this country.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It does not matter whether they fought in this country or not——

Mr. MCEWAN. If we had taken months to consider that law, would it have had any effect in deterring the prize fight from taking place in Mexico?

Mr. HENDERSON. The House very kindly extended the time of the Judiciary Committee the other day. This bill was not called up by the committee to-day but by the gentleman who introduced it. We do not want to take up the time of the House with any bill which will provoke debate, and, with the consent and approval of the gentleman who called it up [Mr. HENDRICK], I will ask to withdraw the bill from the present consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield to me for the purpose of making a report?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I withdraw that motion for a while.

CHICKAMAUGA AND CHATTANOOGA NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Commission on the Dedication of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park. I ask that it be printed and rereferred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio makes a report from the Commission on the Dedication of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park, and asks that it be printed and recommitted. Without objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I call up the naval appropriation bill, which was under consideration yesterday; but I would ask unanimous consent, before entering upon the next paragraph, to make a verbal correction on page 19, or modification at the top of page 19, under the head of "Navy-yard, Brooklyn, N. Y." We amended that paragraph yesterday so as to read: "For quay wall dock No. 3, $60,000." Is that in the text?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the text as it is.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy-yard, Brooklyn, N. Y.: Wing and quay-walls of dry dock No. 3, to be immediately available, $60,000.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is correct. Now please proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

For grading, paving, sidewalks, and sewers, $10,000; quay wall coal dock——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Right there I ask unanimous consent to amend, so as to make it read: "quay wall for coal dock," and strike out "800 feet."

The CHAIRMAN. The correction will be made, if there is no objection.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And also to correct the footing, so it will read, instead of $75,000, $135,000.

The CHAIRMAN. That correction will also be made unless there is objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understand yesterday we reached the clause for the increase of the Navy. The understanding was that at that point the privilege of general debate was to be accorded to members of the committee and such other gentlemen as desired to offer remarks. I suppose the regular order would be to read the paragraph of authorization first and then amendments will be in order. Now I would like, before we begin, to agree as to the amount of time that shall be consumed in general debate.

Mr. HANLY. I suggest that we fix it at 5 o'clock.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood that the gentleman wanted about half an hour.

Mr. HANLY. There are other gentlemen on the committee who wish to be heard, and there are gentlemen who are not on the committee who also desire to be heard.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I certainly desire to consume very little, if any, time. I understand the gentleman from Indiana desires to make some remarks. How long does the gentleman from California desire to speak?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I presume that I could get through in thirty or forty minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What other gentlemen desire to be heard?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to be heard for a few moments.

Mr. FISCHER. I would like to inquire whether gentlemen who desire to offer amendments should offer them when debate on this section is closed or whether the amendment should come in now?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Amendments would be in order to the paragraph after the debate. I am trying to fix the time for general debate. I suppose gentlemen could offer their amendments and then speak to them. Gentlemen can refer to their amendments in debate and offer them afterwards.

Mr. HULICK. As I understand, an amendment is to be offered to increase the number of battle ships. Why not let the amendments be introduced and let them be discussed, and the minor amendments, about which there is no serious trouble, can be offered? Let them be taken up by the parties who desire to introduce them and be disposed of in the order in which they are presented. I make that suggestion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTELLE. For how long?

Mr. HULICK. Not over an hour nor less than five minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. HANLY. I renew my request.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does any other gentleman on the committee desire to take the floor?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I may wish to say something after debate has proceeded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understood that the gentleman desired to address the committee. For how long?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Possibly five or ten minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I see no reason why general debate ought to occupy more than two hours.

Mr. HANLY. That will not be satisfactory. That will be an hour on a side; and that is not sufficient.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is no question of an hour on a side. I do not know that anybody desires to take the other side.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the chairman of the committee—I am not on his committee—as he is now seeking to limit general debate, the real debate, which is the five-minute debate, will still be in order?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, certainly.

Mr. CANNON. That is the real debate on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This simply, I would state to the House, is what is known as general debate, for the purpose of what is designated set speeches; and then we proceed with the reading of the bill by sections under the five-minute rule, which continues until the bill is disposed of. Is there any other gentleman who desires to speak?

Mr. HANLY. I will agree to three hours instead of four.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not think there is any necessity for three hours of debate.

Mr. HANLY. I am not certain that so much time is desired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that general debate be limited to three hours, an hour and a half on a side, and if the whole of that time is not used we can close the general debate sooner and go on with the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed at half past 3 o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] is a good one, to fix the limit of general debate at three hours, which need not all be used if gentlemen do not desire. I presume if I were hard pressed I might talk four or five hours [laughter], but I do not want to, and I presume I can tire everybody here, as well as myself, in thirty minutes. Still, if we have plenty of time we shall all feel better, and I think discussion of this matter ought not to be closely limited. If we fix the time at three hours and we do not want to talk so long, it will not be wasted; it can be used for the consideration of the bill generally.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, my desire is to give gentlemen all the time they need, and I will now ask consent that the general debate upon this paragraph continue for three hours, if that length of time is desired, the time to be equally divided between those who favor the increase and those who oppose it.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that he allow the paragraph to be read, so that gentlemen who desire to offer amendments can do so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I was about to suggest that the paragraph be read, but I suppose amendments will not be strictly in order until the close of the general debate.

Mr. CUMMINGS. But let us know what the proposed amendments are.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to be informed by the chairman of the committee as to who is to control the time on the respective sides.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I should suppose that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs would control the time on one side.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is to control it on the other?

Mr. BOUTELLE. That I do not know.

Mr. HANLY. I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from Indiana proposes to offer an amendment, and I suppose he should control the time on the other side. It is suggested that members are probably familiar with the text of the paragraph, having before them the printed bill, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered as read.

There was no objection.

Mr. HANLY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to offer my amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I see no objection to the gentleman offering his amendment at this time.

Mr. HANLY. Mr. Chairman, then by consent of the House, I send to the desk an amendment which I propose to offer to the paragraph which provides for the increase of the Navy.

The amendment was read, as follows;

Strike out the word "four," in line 2, page 49, after the word "contract," and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

Mr. HANLY. Mr. Chairman, to that amendment I wish to speak. The effect of the amendment will be to increase the number of new battle ships from four to six and to increase the appropriation carried in this bill by something like a million dollars, while providing for the making of contracts that would involve in the end ten million dollars. I offer this amendment with some hesitation because of the fact that the gentlemen on the committee who belong to my political party were opposed to it there, and if this were a party question I say to you frankly that I am partisan enough to have been found with my party. In what I shall say touching this amendment I shall seek to make no reflection upon the good faith, the labor, or the care of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs or of its members generally in considering this measure in committee. I have a profound respect for the chairman because of his long experience as a member of the committee, and I look upon him, as the country does, as the founder and father of the new Navy, because in my judgment through his efforts, through his energy, through his patriotism and breadth of view upon this question we have obtained the start we have toward the construction of a new Navy.

On the 14th of April, 1892, the House having under consideration the naval appropriation bill, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], then a member of the Naval Committee, as he is now, made this appeal to the people of the West:

I believe there are a few, including the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman], who are sufficiently removed from the seaboard or who live high enough up in the mountains to feel secure from bombardment, and who are sublimely philosophical in their willingness to permit their fellow-citizens along the coast to shift for themselves in case of a foreign war.

Again, on the 18th of April, when the same bill was being considered, he said:

To gentlemen from the West let me say, no matter how far you may have gone into the interior, your footsteps toward the setting sun were followed by the fostering care and protection of the patriotic people of the East; and no advance of civilization, no onward march of the pioneer was ever swift enough to outrun the fraternal care and the solicitous, patriotic interest with which the people of the seaboard and of the East have helped to make generous provision for everything that the nation could do for the promotion of your prosperity and the protection of your homes.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the West heard that appeal, and their answer has been made by the retirement of the gentlemen from Indiana, who then misrepresented the people of that State, and by sending 13 members here who are now a part and parcel of this body, and who, in my judgment, are patriotic enough to meet the gentleman from Maine upon this proposition.

I live a thousand miles from the seashore. My people have no interest in this measure, nor have I, save that larger interest that takes in the welfare of the American Republic. While we live a thousand miles from tide water, the bitter experiences of the last three years have taught us that the interests of this nation, while wonderfully diversified, are so closely interwoven that you can not affect one part of the country or one interest without affecting the whole. And viewing the condition of our seaboard cities, counting the population of those cities and the untold wealth that has accumulated in them—always in possession of a pride for the good name and strength and power of the Republic—our people are here now, through their Representatives on this floor, ready to vote for an appropriation that will create a navy sufficient to enforce our rights in every sea.

I wish briefly to go into a comparison of the American Navy with that of Great Britain. I understand fully that the needs of the Republic, so far as a navy is concerned, will always be much less than those of an Empire like Great Britain; yet there should be kept up such a ratio of power as will insure respect for our rights whenever there is a controversy between us and the Government of Great Britain.

The strength of our Navy can readily be computed. We have, all told, 15 armored vessels. Of these 5 are iron low free-board coast-defense monitors, built in 1874 and 1875; 1 is a steel-armored battle ship; 3 are steel-armored cruisers; 1 is a steel seagoing battle ship; 3 are coast-line battle ships; 1 is a steel harbor-defense ram, and 1 a steel low free-board coast-defense battle ship. Of single-turreted iron monitors we have 13; all built in 1862. Of unarmored vessels we have 33. Of these 13 are protected cruisers, all built since 1883; 3 are unprotected cruisers; 1 a dispatch boat; 8 gunboats of modern build; 3 are torpedo boats, 2 of which are steel, 1 for naval cadets, and 1 dynamite cruiser.

Of modern steam vessels we have 22, of which only 6 are iron, and none of which are of modern construction. We have 6 wooden sailing vessels, all built prior to 1862. We have, all told, about 25 ships capable of meeting the battle ships of any other nation of the first power, and of these but 9 are steel armored. The others are protected cruisers, possessed of great speed, but not constructed for engaging heavily armored battle ships.

Great Britain has, or will have when the authorized ships are completed, 60 armored battle ships to our 8; 11 coast-defense vessels to our 20; 29 armored cruisers to our 2. She has 74 unarmored protected cruisers to our 13. She has 92 unarmored cruisers to our 20. She has 16 unarmored gun vessels to our 17. She has 34 unarmored torpedo vessels to our 1, and she has 251 torpedo boats to our 9.

Said Senator PROCTOR in the Senate on the 27th of February last:

If England were to send over such a naval force as she could spare, she would have her own way. She could probably take the whole Navy. By putting all our vessels behind Sandy Hook, we could probably make something of a fight for that place; but nothing to prevent her from taking the whole coast.

That is a comparison of the naval power of Great Britain with that of the United States. I hold in my hand a statement of the appropriations made by Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, and Italy during the year 1895–96 for the maintenance and increase of their navies:

Great Britain	$91,012,156.70
France	52,180,680.00
Germany	19,889,037.41
Russia	23,902,624.50
Italy	17,922,703.42

For the financial year 1894–95:

Great Britain	$84,399,246.00
France	51,504,275.00
Germany	17,593,000.00
Russia	21,158,565.00
Italy	18,502,589.00

Last February, when Parliament convened, in the face of Great Britain's already stupendous power at sea, in the face of the fact that year after year she had been making great improvements in her naval vessels and in their armament, the Queen said to the English Parliament:

> The extension and improvement of the naval defenses of the Empire are the most important subjects to which your efforts can be directed and will doubtless occupy your most earnest attention.

What has been the answer of the British Parliament to this appeal? Right Hon. George Goschen, first lord of the Admiralty, brought in a naval programme that involved the appropriation of $120,000,000 for the increase of the navy during this year. That is the amount asked, and an overwhelming majority of the English Parliament is ready to indorse that programme. In response to public sentiment Parliament must needs sanction it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will say to my friend that the bill carrying out that programme has already passed the House of Commons.

Mr. HANLY. So I understand—by a majority of 264, if I remember correctly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. You are right.

Mr. HANLY. Within the last eight years Parliament has provided for the construction of 23 armored battle ships of the first class, besides a large number of cruisers and torpedo boats. The naval bill this year calls for the construction of 5 more battle ships, 13 cruisers, and 28 destroyers, that being the name applied to large seagoing torpedo craft.

Since 1883, the year in which the reconstruction of the American Navy began, we have expended for the increase of the Navy, including all of the ships authorized or in process of construction up to this time, $110,371,710.10. In thirteen years we have appropriated less money for the construction of our Navy than the English have appropriated for this single year. England expends almost as much annually as we have expended in all of that period. To-day our Navy ranks as the sixth among the navies of the world; and, gentlemen, to me it is a deeply humiliating idea that our coast may be plundered at any time by a power like Holland, Spain, or even Chile. Six millions of our countrymen and untold millions of property value are at the mercy of any second-class power; and we are absolutely helpless to check an offensive movement or to participate in an aggressive one. We are helpless alike for aggression or defense.

In keeping with this line of thought I wish to call the attention of the committee to the decadence of American power, as illustrated by our merchant marine. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs truthfully said on yesterday that our commerce always followed our flag; and, my friends, as the flag has departed from the high seas, so American commerce has disappeared. Let me give you some data on that question.

In 1894 there were 17,060 American sailing merchant vessels and 6,526 steam merchant vessels, making a total of 23,586 in all. That year the value of our carrying trade—the amount of our imports alone—was $625,371,527. Of this amount, $121,561,193 was carried in American ships and $503,810,334 was carried in foreign vessels. In other words, 19 per cent of the imports of that year was carried by American vessels and 80 per cent by foreign ships. Why, gentlemen, even in 1850 we controlled 63 per cent of our foreign trade—that is, of our imports.

In 1884 we exported $842,000,000 worth of merchandise; $73,707,023, or 8 per cent, of this was carried in American ships and $769,212,122, or 91.3 per cent, was carried in foreign vessels, and though our total carrying trade amounted to $1,468,290,672 for the year 1894, Americans carried in American ships but $195,268,216, or 13.3 per cent, while foreign vessels carried $1,273,022,456, or 86.7 per cent.

To my mind, Mr. Chairman, it is high time that the American people were waking up to the importance of the declaration made by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs on yesterday, that commerce must, in the very nature of things, follow the flag.

Another consideration showing the need of the Navy. I spoke of the great coast line of the United States a moment ago. I find that we have an Atlantic coast line of 6,000 miles; that we have a Gulf coast line of 3,000 miles, a Pacific coast line of 2,000 miles, an Alaskan coast line, including the bays and inland waters of Alaska, of 8,000 miles, and an Arctic coast line of 2,000 miles, or in all 22,000 miles of coast line, with but six battle ships to protect it. We have a lake area in the United States navigable for large vessels of 98,000 square miles to protect. We have seaboard cities, 11 in number, that have 4,000,000 of population and untold millions of wealth. In my judgment, with the Navy that we now have, that population and that accumulation of wealth is at the absolute mercy of any second-class naval power in the world. I know it will cost something to build ships, but it will cost infinitely more some day to repair the ruin wrought by our neglect to reenforce our Navy so that we may have a line of battle, as the chairman of the committee said on yesterday, beyond the headlands to protect the people and the property of our seacoast.

I for one, Mr. Chairman, have been convinced and am convinced that it is time the American people should formulate and enter upon a distinctive national policy. Practically we have had none on this subject. I remember, I think, on every occasion in the House since I have been a member—only a short time it is true, yet many things have occurred of national importance in that short time—that every time that anyone has risen here to speak of an aggressive policy on the part of the American Republic some one has turned and pointed with reverential finger to the advice and counsel of Washington, in his Farewell Address, made in the infancy of the Republic with reference to the subject of the increase of the American Navy. I wish to briefly advert to that advice. The message contained these words:

> The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith.
> Here let us stop.
> Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns.
> Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.
> Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. * * *
> Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand on foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice? * * *
> It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it, for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs, that honesty is the best policy. I repeat, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them. * * *

Now, Mr. Chairman, mark the basis upon which that opinion was rendered.

> The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and constancy which it is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortune.

That advice was rendered at a time when there were but 4,000,000 people in these United States. It was given at a time when there were but a few billions of property in the United States, at a time when we were in our swaddling clothes, occupying a narrow fringe of territory along the seaboard. To-day we have a population of 70,000,000 people; we have wealth aggregating seventy thousand millions of dollars; we have spread across the continent until the waters of the two seas wash the feet of great cities that belong to us. I say that that advice has ceased to be applicable to this country.

> New occasions teach new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth;
> They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of Truth.
> Lo! before us gleam her camp fires, we ourselves must pilgrims be,
> Launch our Mayflower, and steer boldly through the desperate winter sea;
> Nor tempt the Future's portal with the Past's blood-rusted key.

New duties, new conditions, confront the people of this Republic now, and it is time, in my judgment, that we entered upon a distinctively national policy. [Applause.] I know that the generation which fought to a conclusion the great war, both North and South, were satiated with blood. I know that they had enough, and they turned gladly from the turmoil of war to the peaceful avocations of life. Thirty years of peace, thirty years of accumulation of wealth and of material power, have lessened somewhat the national feeling that existed at that time. We have become a peaceful, gain-loving people. We must remember, however, that a peaceful, gain-loving people are never farsighted; that such a people usually sleep until golden opportunities have passed by, until destiny has turned her back to them, and they are left to take what surrounding nations are willing to concede. Without the sea Holland died, France languished, Spain sunk to the rank of a second-class power, and Carthagena became a province of Rome. As a nation we seem to have been entirely engrossed in our domestic affairs, absorbed in making money. Content in simply growing rich, we have apparently lost sight of every outside interest and have sat by unconcerned while foreign nations have eagerly sought and obtained points of vantage about us on every hand, viewed either from a commercial or military standpoint.

England and her dependencies on the north of us have completed on Canadian soil a waterway to the sea. Subsidized by the Government, a great railway connects the two oceans, while English forts and English coaling stations surround us on every side, located always at points most advantageous for commercial and military supremacy. Arrogant and grasping, she has held up the little Republic of Nicaragua and at the point of the bayonet compelled that Republic to pay such damages as she (England) has deemed right. We have watched her as year by year she encroached upon Venezuela, until to-day she possesses Venezuelan soil to the extent of 40,000 square miles, an area greater than the State which I in part represent. To all this for thirty years the American people have been as oblivious as though these aggressions affected only the inhabitants of Mars instead of being fraught as they are with far-reaching and lasting import to ourselves.

Until recently the Monroe doctrine has been a dead letter. Islands lying in the heart of the Pacific, the controlling point in the commerce of that great ocean, have been tendered us of the free will of those in control and we have rejected them. Unmindful of future commercial progress, we have even refused a small appropriation for the construction of a cable to those islands. Given the opportunity to construct and control the Nicaragua Canal, we haggle and cavil about the cost as though it were a matter to be measured by a Congressional appropriation. With wealth ever accumulating we hesitate to construct deep waterways connecting the Great Lakes with the sea on the east or the Gulf on the south; and in this we deliberately, for a few paltry dollars, break faith with our own posterity, turn our backs on our own future. We are told that the cost of this will be too great; that the cost of all this will imperil a few doubtful Congressional districts in the approaching elections.

It has been dinned into my ear constantly in the committee room and out of it, Mr. Chairman, on every hand, that we ought not to make this appropriation because our Democratic friends would not make one when they were in power. Looking back over the debates, I find that the Democratic party, as a rule, has been enthusiastically in favor of appropriations for the Navy when they were out of power and not responsible, and I find that the Republican party has largely pursued the same policy. Why, sir, the chairman of this committee, speaking in a Democratic Congress, urged an appropriation for 10 war ships. Why not now? Why not now, when clothed with power and authority? Let him answer it. I do not for myself favor that kind of politics. I am heartily sick of it all, and so are the people of these United States. It seems—

> The age of virtuous politics is past,
> And we are deep in that of cold pretense.
> Patriots have become too shrewd to be sincere,
> And we need not be surprised if the people are too wise to trust us.

As for myself, I propose to vote while a Representative in this Chamber for that which will best conserve the interests of this entire nation; and if that vote does not suit my people, then they have their remedy and it is complete. They may retire me to private life. But, my friends, in my judgment the Nicaragua Canal will be built; the narrow strip of 200 miles that has for so many years kept apart the affectionate waters of the two oceans will not continue to be a barrier to the genius and the energy of the twentieth century. We will find a way across the Isthmus or we will make it, regardless of its cost. [Loud applause.] If we are to continue to control this continent; if we are to remain dominant on this hemisphere, there must be a revival of nationalism; we must resist foreign aggressions and embrace every opportunity for the extension of American commerce and American influence and power. In my mind, a nation no more than an individual can afford to trifle with its destiny.

> Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
> In the strife with Truth and Falsehood, for the good or evil side;
> Some great cause, God's new Messiah, offering each the bloom or blight,
> Parts the goats upon the left hand, and the sheep upon the right;
> And the choice goes by forever 'twixt that darkness and that light.

[Applause.]

We find that the American people are already assuming this condition. You will find evidence of it here. You found evidence of it, gentlemen, when Mr. Cleveland for the second time in his eight years incumbency, of the Presidency so far forgot his political convictions as to become President of the whole people. That was indicated when he sent to this House this message:

> The course to be pursued by this Government, in view of the present condition, does not appear to admit of serious doubt. Having labored faithfully for many years to induce Great Britain to submit this dispute to impartial arbitration, and having been now finally apprised of her refusal to do so, nothing remains but to accept the situation, to recognize its plain requirements, and deal with it accordingly. Great Britain's present proposition has never thus far been regarded as admissible by Venezuela, though any adjustment of the boundary which that country may deem for her advantage and may enter into of her own free will can not of course be objected to by the United States.
> Assuming, however, that the attitude of Venezuela will remain unchanged, the dispute has reached such a stage as to make it now incumbent upon the United States to take measures to determine with sufficient certainty for its justification what is the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana. * * *
> In making these recommendations I am fully alive to the responsibility incurred and keenly realize all the consequences that may follow.
> I am, nevertheless, firm in my conviction that while it is a grievous thing to contemplate the two great English-speaking peoples of the world as being otherwise than friendly competitors in the onward march of civilization and strenuous and worthy rivals in all the arts of peace, there is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor, beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

I remember the scene when that challenge was sent to England. I remember the scene in this Hall when party lines were blotted out; when politicians hushed their cavil; when party rancors seemed cold, and when the members of this House stood as one man to indorse that message of a President of the United States. Now, I say to you, my friends, you ought to again rise above party politics; you ought to again rise above a doubtful district and be patriots when you vote for this appropriation.

Following that came the Armenian resolutions, which I will send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate with the Governments signatory to the treaty of Berlin the profound regret of the American people and their Government that the engagements made in that convention for the security of the Armenian Christians have not been performed: and

Be it further resolved, That the Government of the United States expresses its sympathy for the Armenian people and its hope that the Government of the Sultan will at once extend to them full and adequate protection for the preservation of life, the security of property, and the free exercise of religion.

Mr. HANLY. Following that challenge to the powers of Europe came one that I now send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the opinion of Congress a state of public war exists in Cuba, the parties to which are entitled to belligerent rights, and the United States should observe a strict neutrality between the belligerents.

Resolved, That Congress deplores the destruction of life and property caused by the war now raging in that island, and believing that the only permanent solution of the contest equally in the interest of Spain, the people of Cuba, and other nations would be in the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba, it is the sense of Congress that the Government of the United States should use its good offices and friendly influence to that end.

Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European Governments and their colonies on this continent; but from the very close relations between the people of the United States and those of Cuba in consequence of its proximity and the extent of the commerce between the two peoples, the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of the opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of Americans by intervention if necessary.

Mr. HANLY. Mr. Chairman, this House has been in session since the 2d day of December, and in that short time these three challenges have been sent from this Chamber to foreign powers; rightly so, I concede. I voted for them; did it gladly and proudly; but in the face of that attitude we ought not now to be parsimonious when it comes to putting the people of the United States on such a naval footing, if I may use the word, as will enable them to meet the answer to be made by these foreign powers. It has been urged, Mr. Chairman, that we can not construct these battle ships any sooner by appropriating for them now than we can if we appropriate for four now and two at the next Congress. Two at the next Congress! If we need them, why not vote for them now? It will not save the Government a dollar by putting it off. You may juggle the people, but I doubt it. If you think you can continue to do so, very well; but you only deceive yourselves, as the gentlemen on the Democratic side of the Chamber have learned.

In answer to that criticism, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the following correspondence between myself and the Secretary of the Navy and two of the armor plants of this country. I ask the Clerk to omit so much as refers to the docks, and that he read all the rest.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 9, 1896.

SIR: In reply to your letter of inquiry, propounding certain questions regarding the ability to furnish armor in connection with proposed shipbuilding, I have the honor to reply as follows:

1. If this Congress should authorize 6 battle ships instead of a lesser number, and in addition to the 2 already authorized, making 8 in all, and their building should be commenced immediately, the two armor plants at present in the United States would be able to keep pace with the work of construction and furnish armor as fast as needed.

2. The present capacity of the two armor plants on limited orders is 300 tons per month each, or 7,200 tons annually for both establishments. On this basis all the armor required for 6 battle ships could be furnished in twenty-eight months. With large orders for armor, especially in the case of armor for a number of ships of the same general type, where a great many plates of the same shape and dimensions would be required, and which could be carried along together through the various processes of manufacture, it is estimated that the output for each establishment would be increased to 400 tons per month, and on this latter basis the armor for 6 battle ships would be finished in twenty-one months. It will be seen, therefore, that there is no reason to fear delay in the completion of battle ships on account of nondelivery of their armor. The amount of armor required for 1 battle ship is 2,800 tons.

3. The present contracts for armor were made as follows:

	Tons.
June 1, 1887, Bethlehem Iron Company	6,700
November 20, 1890, Carnegie Steel Company	6,000
February 28, 1893, Carnegie Steel Company	2,900
March 1, 1893, Bethlehem Iron Company	3,560

Deliveries commenced in August, 1891, 138 tons being delivered in that year, since which time there has been a gradual but large increase in the output, due to experience and increase in facilities, until each establishment is now able to deliver at least 300 tons per month. During the month of February the Carnegie Steel Company delivered over 700 tons.

4. The Department is not in possession of the details as to the contracts made between the Russian Government and the armor manufacturers in this country. It is understood, however, that the quantity of armor is small and that the work is already well advanced, so that those contracts can not in any way delay the completion of armor which may be ordered by the United States. It is also understood that these contracts were entered into by the company because the amount of work furnished by this Government was not sufficient to keep the plants in operation, their capacity being far beyond that of the present demands upon them.

5. The guns and mounts required for the 6 battle ships could be completed in ample time to be installed before the actual completion of the ships. Twenty-four 13-inch guns, 24 8-inch guns, and 84 5-inch guns, with mounts for all, would be required, and all these could be furnished at the naval gun factory within the time required to complete the ships, considering also all work still to be done for vessels already authorized.

Contracts have already been made with two companies, the Bethlehem and the Midvale, for the manufacture of the 8-inch and 13-inch gun forgings for battle ships Nos. 5 and 6. The deliveries for all the 5-inch forgings of these 2 ships will be completed on the 17th instant.

If additional ships are authorized, the Carnegie Steel Company will immediately make additions to their present plant and take up the manufacture of gun forgings, so that the Department would have the advantage of opportunity for competition and a greatly increased source of supply. The American Ordnance Company is ready to manufacture all the smaller caliber of guns, should it be considered advantageous by the Department to supplement the facilities of the naval gun shop.

6. There have been no delays in the building of the present battle ships occasioned by the backwardness in furnishing the armament. Some delays have been occasioned by the want of armor, but it should be borne in mind that an effort has been made to satisfy the almost simultaneous demands for armor for 15 ships, whose authorization by Congress covered a period of ten years, and that this has been practically accomplished in a little over four years, even while the plants were being erected and labor trained for this work. The difficulties attending the manufacture of armor in this country have been many, and the plants have slowly but surely attained their full capacity, so that former delays would be no criterion of their present undisputed ability to furnish armor as fast as required. The material employed is one with which no previous experience had been elsewhere obtained; and despite the fact that the dimensions and weight of the heaviest plates exceeded considerably those manufactured for any other navy in the world, a process surrounded by difficulties pronounced insurmountable by many of the most prominent engineers in this and other countries has been successfully developed and applied. With the present enlarged experience and improved facilities at each of the armor establishments either of them can manufacture the armor for a battle ship in about one-third the time required to build the ship itself.

11. The Department incloses herewith copy of a letter just received from the Bethlehem Iron Company, from which it will be seen that in the foregoing statement the Department has underestimated the quantity of armor and gun steel which that firm would undertake to deliver under a penalty for delays. The Department has not as yet received any advices from the Carnegie Steel Company, but there is no doubt that company would also undertake to deliver an equal quantity of material subject to a penalty for delays.

Respectfully,

H. A. HERBERT, Secretary.

THE BETHLEHEM IRON COMPANY,
South Bethlehem, Pa., March 9, 1896.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 7th regarding the output of armor and gun forgings which we would be able to guarantee in case several ships were appropriated for, we beg to report as follows:

We could manufacture and deliver about 400 tons a month of such armor plate as we are now under contract to deliver without enlargement of our plant as at present erected or completing, and, by the purchase of a few more machine tools, could reach 500 tons or more. The tools in view we could procure in three or four months, which would be as soon after signing a contract as we would have work for them.

As regards gun forgings, we are prepared to undertake to deliver 5 sets of 13-inch gun forgings within six months from date of contract and at the rate of 12 sets per annum thereafter. We would undertake at the same time to deliver sets of 8-inch gun forgings at the same rates as above, and sets of 5-inch gun forgings at the rate of 12 sets in the first six months and 20 sets in each six months thereafter. These three plans of delivery are intended to run at the same time. The above we could do with our present plant, and the 16 13-inch, 16 8-inch, and 50 5-inch sets we could deliver in a little less than eighteen months.

If the larger number of guns indicated by you were called for, namely, those for additional ships, being, with those now on hand, double the number above, we could, by procuring a few more machine tools, make deliveries as follows:

A first set of 13-inch gun forgings in ninety days, and the remainder at the rate of one set in every twenty days; sets of 8-inch gun forgings at identical rates; and a first set of 5-inch forgings in sixty days, and the remainder at the rate of one set in every seven days.

We should be ready to enter into contract with the Government to deliver under penalties at the above rates.

Yours, truly,

THE BETHLEHEM IRON COMPANY,
By ROBERT A. SAYRE, Vice-President.

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF ORDNANCE,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

THE BETHLEHEM IRON COMPANY,
South Bethlehem, Pa., March 10, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: Our president, Mr. Linderman, to whom your letter of March 6 was addressed, is absent in Europe, and I am requested by our vice-president to say, in reply to your letter, that with our present plant we can manufacture and deliver 400 tons of armor plate a month, and if larger amounts should be required, in the event of large number of ships being appropriated for, this delivery could be increased very materially without entailing any delays. This for the reason that our casting and forging departments, which require a long time to build, are amply able to manufacture more plates than we have ever had orders for, and it would be only necessary to increase the number of machine tools, which we can always do upon receipt of an order, and receive the tools before the armor plates in the course of manufacture are sufficiently far advanced to require these tools.

Yours, truly,

J. F. MEIGS, Engineer of Ordnance.

Hon. J. FRANK HANLY,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

THE CARNEGIE STEEL COMPANY, LIMITED,
Pittsburg, Pa., March 12, 1896.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of 6th instant, would say:

The present American factories are undoubtedly equipped to turn out the armor plate that would be required for eight battle ships as rapidly as the hulls would be ready to receive it.

The capacity of our present plant is estimated at from 4,000 to 6,000 tons per annum, depending upon the character of the orders and based on the assumption that orders would be placed in such manner that all parts of our plant could be operated continuously to their maximum capacity. We have been making additions to our armor plant whenever it was found necessary to do so for the prompt execution of orders.

If additional battle ships are authorized, we are willing to bind ourselves to manufacture and deliver such portion of the armor as may be ordered of us as rapidly as it will be required in the construction of the ships.

We have practically finished all of our armor orders for the United States Government, as only about 100 tons yet remain to be shipped.

Very respectfully,

THE CARNEGIE STEEL COMPANY, LIMITED,
By L. C. PHIPPS, Vice-President.

Hon. J. FRANK HANLY,
Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HANLY. I ask that the further reading be omitted, and that the remainder of the correspondence be inserted in the RECORD.

The correspondence I have just submitted to the House is by the Secretary of the Navy and by the management of the two great armor-producing factories in the United States, and there can be no question made, after reading the statements there, but that the armor can be produced as rapidly as required to construct these ships. I submit that they can be constructed more cheaply, comparatively, if they are all constructed now, if the contract is let at one time, and if these great shipbuilding concerns of the country have an opportunity to bid upon six ships instead of four.

It has been urged, Mr. Chairman, against this amendment, that the Treasury of the United States is now empty. I say to my Republican friends with that we have nothing to do. We are not responsible for the deficit in the Federal Treasury. When we laid down the reins of Government we left laws upon the statute books that were supplying a sufficient revenue to defray the expenses of the nation, and with that objection we have nothing to do. There is a further answer to it also. This nation, in my judgment, is on the eve of a return to the protection of McKinley and the reciprocity of James G. Blaine [applause], and when that is accomplished there will be revenue sufficient to meet every demand made upon the Federal Treasury. That will happen, in my judgment, before the last hammer stroke is made upon the vessels for which you are now asked to vote an appropriation. Before the last dollar is appropriated for those vessels this nation will again be standing on the purple heights of prosperity.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say that the American people will awaken to the present conditions that surround them; that we will construct the Nicaragua Canal, and that we will put a fleet by and by upon the waters of the Caribbean Sea and in the Gulf of Mexico that will secure to us the control of that great ocean highway when we once have builded it. When that canal is built it will become a great highway of commerce. The nations of Europe will be brought to our very shores. Then complications will arise. Then, sir, we will indeed face a crisis in our affairs.

Sir, the nation that has taken from France and Holland and Germany the control of the English Channel; that has wrested from the Spanish people the embattled crest of Gibraltar and held it for a century and a half against the oft-repeated efforts of France and Spain to regain it; the nation that wrested from the grudging grasp of the great Napoleon the Island of Malta and held it in spite of his prowess; the nation that is quietly but persistently seeking position after position of strategic note and importance in every land and on every sea where her people emigrate or her ships can go, will not be slow to risk the wage of war for the control of this great highway of commerce—a highway, the control of which would give her the dominion, commercially speaking, of not this Republic alone, but of the American Hemisphere. I believe it the duty of the American Congress to so legislate now that we will when the crisis comes, as come it will, have a fleet in those waters that will command the respect and submission of English greed and English avarice. [Applause.] "Peace the offspring is of power." With such a fleet we can maintain peace with honor; without it, humiliation must needs come.

Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to continue so long in the abuse of the patience of the committee, but I feel strongly upon this question, and that, sir, must be my excuse. I am impatient for the time when my country's rights, or reparation for her wrongs, shall be enforced by her fleets in every land and on every sea throughout the world. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to know how much time the gentleman has occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has occupied fifty-one minutes.

Mr. HANLY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK].

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. HANLY] on the very happy address that he has given us upon the Navy of this country, and upon the sentiment that he has incorporated in his remarks. I approve everything that he has said in regard to our Navy and in regard to the duty of this Congress to provide a proper naval construction. But are we at this moment ready to vote for more battle ships than are proposed in the bill that is now under consideration? I want to indorse especially what the gentleman has so well said, and what we all in the committee understand, as to the obligation that we are under to the chairman of our committee, and I want to congratulate the chairman upon presenting to this House and to the country a bill which has received nearly the unanimous approval in the House, an approval such as I apprehend no prior naval appropriation bill has been fortunate enough to command.

I want to congratulate this House upon having as its leading representative upon the Committee on Naval Affairs and in charge of that committee a gentleman who has been so arduous in the performance of his duties and has rendered such valuable service not only to the House but to the country. On that point also, therefore, I fully agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I want to say at this point, Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of other members of the committee, that I should be glad to vote now, if I could, for the protection of our coast, and for the construction of 6 instead of 4 new battle ships, as proposed by this amendment.

I should have been glad also if I could have voted for the proposition of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] for the construction of a dry dock at Algiers. It is not provided for in this bill, but I want to say that his constituents must not blame him, that, while he has failed to secure that construction at this time, he deserves a better fate on account of the manner in which he worked for it and his persistent efforts in that behalf; and if there was to be a dry dock provided for anywhere at this session of Congress, and only one, I should have voted for that one in the South, believing that the people there are entitled to it, and also because its construction at that place, in my judgment, would be beneficial not only to our Navy, but to the commerce not alone of the Mississippi River, but also of the Ohio River, in which my constituents have a special interest.

I wish to congratulate my friend from California also [Mr. HILBORN] upon his faithful, persistent efforts before the committee for the location of a dock at Mare Island for the benefit of his constituents and his State. I also offer my congratulations to the Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] for his persistent attempt to secure one at Boston, and to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBINSON] for his energetic efforts to secure one at League Island. They have all failed, but it is not because they did not want them and did not labor for them. And it was not the fault of any member of the committee that they did not get what they so much desired.

Mr. BARRETT. In order that we who are interested in these dry docks may understand exactly where we stand, will the gentleman tell us whose fault it was that we did not get them?

Mr. HULICK. It is because of the lack of money in the Treasury of the United States and the need of preserving the credit of the Government at this time that members of this committee have said "No, we have not the means now; we must take care of the docks already under construction or needing repairs; we must use money for the increase of the Navy; we need it also for the enlistment of men and for the payment of similar services rather than for the construction of new dry docks." And further I may say, as is suggested by a gentleman near me, that we have taken this position because the Secretary of the Navy (in his last report) expressly recommended against the establishment of these dry docks.

Mr. BARRETT. Now, will the gentleman allow me another question? Whether the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs were not fully aware of the state of the Treasury and the peculiar views of the Secretary of the Navy when they deliberately voted to put into this bill a provision for three new dry docks?

Mr. HULICK. Yes, sir; and I voted for it. I believe it was on my motion that the number was increased from one to two and from two to three. And I would have kept on voting to this time and would have increased the number to fifty if they had been asked for; but I did not expect that any one of those propositions would be finally adopted; it was not the understanding that they should be.

Mr. BARRETT. One more question and I am done. Does the gentleman wish us to understand that the Committee on Naval Affairs when they voted in favor of the construction of dry docks did so with the deliberate intention of not recommending the construction of those dry docks to the House?

Mr. HULICK. I answer the gentleman in this way: If we should begin the erection of dry docks we would begin at those places where dry docks are most needed. We realized that a dry dock was needed at Algiers, that one was needed at Portsmouth, that one was needed at Mare Island—and the Secretary of the Navy had so recommended; but as we looked at the question we could not begin the construction of dry docks at this time because we wanted to increase our Navy, and considering the depleted condition of the Treasury we could not do both.

Mr. BARRETT. Now, the gentleman has reached exactly the point I wanted to bring out. As I understand, the Committee on Naval Affairs believe that these dry docks should be constructed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. HULICK. I believe so myself; I think the committee are of the same opinion, and if at the next session we can enter upon these works—if with the Republican party voted into power we can have a protective tariff to bring money into the Treasury, I shall be ready to vote not only for the three dry docks that have been named, but for others that are needed. But in the first place we must give proper attention to the dry docks we already have. We do not want a dry dock in such a condition as that at Port Royal. When the Indiana was sent there a few days since to be docked, the dock was in such a condition that the vessel could not get into it to be repaired, and there is not sufficient water in the channel to let the great ship out of the port—the moon and high tide can alone afford relief. There is where we need to spend money in the first instance, instead of making an appropriation to construct a dry dock, for instance, at Algiers, which is estimated to cost $1,200,000. We are not ready to make any such large appropriation at this time in this direction. In this connection I call attention to what the Secretary of the Navy has said in his report:

> In my opinion it would be wise to invest whatever moneys are to be expended upon the Navy beyond its current needs and the necessities of existing repair plants in the construction of new ships, and not in building docks.

The Secretary further adds:

> In my opinion to undertake all this work would be extravagant, and I feel sure it would lead to much unwise expenditure of money in the future.

I indorse what the honorable Secretary has said on this subject, and I think the country will approve his conclusions.

The Secretary says further:

> There should be a dockyard and repairing station on or contiguous to the Gulf of Mexico for the use of vessels cruising in the Caribbean Sea and other southern waters, but it is for Congress to say whether the condition of the Treasury is such as to justify it in undertaking the construction of such a dock at present.

There are other declarations of the Secretary of the Navy to the same effect upon this question.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. HULICK. Well, I would rather not be interrupted.

Mr. ADAMS. This is a practical question.

Mr. HULICK. Proceed.

Mr. ADAMS. I want to ask the gentleman whether there is a single accessible dock to-day in the United States in which the largest ships that we have can be docked for repairing, painting, or scraping?

Mr. HULICK. I apprehend not. But I answer further that I am in favor of making appropriations to enlarge the existing docks, whether at New York, Mare Island, Portsmouth, Boston, or elsewhere, so that large vessels may be docked there. The large dock at Port Royal, S. C., should be put in condition at once. It should have been finished, according to contract, April 23, 1893. Let it be put in condition to receive our largest ships at once before we begin to build new docks.

Mr. ADAMS. Then let me ask why the committee has not recommended the enlargement of docks at points where it is known that there is sufficient water to float these large ships?

Mr. HULICK. That is being done now. The dock at Brooklyn Navy-Yard is expected to be ready for use by the 1st of June next, and when completed will be large enough to accommodate our largest vessels. This was to have been completed last September, but the builder failed to comply with his contract, and it had to be sublet. That, with the Port Royal dock, will, when put proper in condition, furnish ample accommodation to dock all our largest war vessels.

The Secretary has now full authority to repair and enlarge docks where it is needed, and he is doing this as rapidly as possible.

Mr. ADAMS. How are we going to take care of the ships now afloat? That is a business question.

Mr. HULICK. Disclaiming any intention of being discourteous, I shall have to decline to submit to further interruption.

Mr. ADAMS. Then the committee have no answer to the question why they will not supply docks to take care of the ships now afloat, though at the same time they are proposing to build six more?

Mr. HULICK. Long before our new ships are built we will have ample facilities for docking all of them.

I must decline to yield further.

Mr. ADAMS. This is a plain business proposition.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to indorse further what has been so well said by the gentleman from Indiana. The facts that he has given us in regard to the navies of England, France, and other foreign countries were entertaining, and they will be good reading for his constituents and mine and for the country at large. But I am not going to institute a comparison between our navy and that of foreign nations at this time. It is unnecessary in connection with this discussion. This is purely a business proposition we are discussing—whether we shall have six new ships as the amendment proposes, or four, as provided in the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me just there——

Mr. HULICK. Well, I hope my colleague will excuse me. I desire to proceed without interruption. I would do any favor for him, and when we get over into Ohio in the campaign this fall stumping for McKinley I will divide time with him. [Laughter.]

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I wish no comparison with the navies of foreign nations, because the conditions are essentially different in our country and theirs. European nations have been hundreds of years in organizing and maintaining large and costly navies. The stability of their thrones depended upon them, and the very existence of their Governments was assured only by their powerful navies.

Those navies are used in countries where their rulers are born, not made; where to-day they do not know who is to be the ruler of to-morrow, until that ruler is born into the world. But we have a country here where our rulers are not born to rule, but where by their own merit and intellectual powers, by their energy, their moral worth, their manhood, their statesmanship, they are called to rule over this Government, and the young man from the cabin goes to the Presidential chair to administer the affairs of the greatest nation on earth because the policy he indorses or the party which supports him represents a great principle. He represents a country that does not have to depend upon standing armies or great navies to sustain itself. It is therefore not proper or just to make such comparisons. Nevertheless I favor the enlargement of our Navy from a commercial standpoint. Commerce follows our flag, and that must be protected wherever it floats, as it always has been in the past. We do not think it necessary, therefore, for the construction of more battle ships at this time than those which are recommended in the bill of the committee.

The Secretary of the Navy in his report recommended the construction of two additional battle ships. At the time he made his report we did not have the same circumstances surrounding us that we have to-day; but while we were considering the matter the Secretary came before the committee, on the 11th day of February last, and made his recommendation with reference to the number of battle ships that in his judgment was deemed necessary or advisable at the time. He informed the committee that we have now the Massachusetts, the Indiana, the Oregon, the Iowa, and the two recently contracted for and under construction, the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, which make six first-class battle ships; and in his report he recommended two additional. Ordinarily the committee would have indorsed absolutely the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and would have provided for but two additional. But the circumstances which existed at the time the report of the Secretary was filed have changed. Our relations to other countries have become strained, and the Secretary advised the committee that—

Since that time I have come to the conclusion that we might with advantage build four additional battle ships, etc.

Now, as to the cost of building these ships, it is conceded they can be built much cheaper than ever before. The Secretary says, in his statement before the committee:

I thought I had the statement here, but I can state it in general terms, that the fall in the price of battle ships between the time of the contract for the Indiana and for the Kentucky and Kearsarge is nearly 30 per cent; and I have stated in my annual report, which came out before these bids were made, that—

"The prices per ton for the gunboats Machias and Castine, contracted for in April, 1890, was $302.86; the average price of the 3 gunboats contracted for in January, 1894, and of the 6 others just let out the contract is $222.34 per ton, a saving of $80.52 per ton, or 26 per cent of the price of the ships.

"The price of the Ericsson, contracted for in October, 1891, was $945.83 per ton; the average price of the 6 torpedo boats contracted for in 1895 is $766.58 per ton, a reduction of $179.25 per ton, or of about 20 per cent in the price of the boats."

It is 26 per cent in one case and 20 per cent in the other, so those reductions, you see, apply as well to battle ships as to gunboats and torpedo boats. We have now a very earnest competition for the building of all these ships. There does not seem, so far as the construction of ships are concerned, to have been any combination whatever or any sign of a combination between bidders, but the Government is getting the advantage of forced competition and getting the very lowest prices.

For these and other considerations the committee ask for 4 battle ships and 15 torpedo boats, requiring the largest appropriation that has ever before been made by any Congress for our Navy, and yet the gentleman from Indiana insists on 2 more battle ships, while we now have, including the Kentucky and Kearsarge, 6 to pay for, at a cost of at least $25,000,000.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will my colleague allow a question there for information? What do you claim will be the additional cost of constructing the two battle ships?

Mr. HULICK. You mean the two already contracted for, the Kearsarge and the Kentucky? These ships were authorized to cost not exceeding $4,000,000. But they have been contracted for, however, at a much less figure.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What is to be the total cost of these ships, complete?

Mr. HANLY. Five million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars will be the total cost, including armament; that is, the complete battle ship.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. That is the cost of each ship?

Mr. HULICK. Yes; the cost of each ship. The gentleman can obtain all the information on these facts by an examination of the report; but with reference to this question all that the gentleman from Indiana has said applies as well to the four battle ships as to the six.

Now, what is our Navy at this time? In 1883 the first steel battle ships, the first steel cruisers, were constructed under contracts that had been duly entered into. From the close of the war up to 1883, about eighteen years, the appropriation for the repairs of our ships and for construction amounted to about one and one-half million of dollars annually. But in 1883 the legislation of this country was such that they proposed to do away with the wooden ships unless they could be repaired at an expense of not exceeding 20 per cent of the cost of a new ship, and when the cost of the repairs of a wooden ship exceeded that they said, "Let the ship go; we will not expend any more money in its repairs, but we will begin the construction of a new navy."

Now, in 1885 we had 32 wooden vessels afloat, of a displacement of 66,000 tons, and at that time 7 war ships only, of a displacement of 6,900 tons. The total was 39 ships, with a displacement of 72,900 tons. Now, from 1885 to 1895, in ten years, we reduced the number of wooden vessels from 32 to 11, by letting them go out of commission. The 11 wooden vessels had a displacement of 18,300 tons, and instead of having 7 steel ships, we had 32 iron and steel vessels, with a total displacement of 104,500 tons. We had a total of 43 vessels, with a displacement of 122,800 tons, the amount being almost doubled in ten years; these figures being exclusive of torpedo boats, tugs, and receiving ships. That was during a time of entire peace, when we had no wars or rumors of wars, when the people of this country were not nervous over our foreign relations with other countries. Was not that fast enough progress in the construction of our Navy?

For these new steel vessels the appropriations for the last three years amounted to about a million dollars annually.

Now, as to the appropriations for the new navy. The new ships that have been built will soon require to go into dock, and the cost of redocking and keeping our new navy in repair—in a seagoing condition—is far greater than ever before; it is more expensive to keep the Navy up at this time, with the new steel vessels, when they begin to need docking, than it would have been to keep the old wooden vessels in repair. That is one of the important considerations, that these four new vessels which we authorize and the two under construction and those that have been constructed will require a greater appropriation every year to keep them in repair than the old wooden vessels would have required. If the gentleman is on that committee in the next Congress—and I hope he will be returned by his constituents—he will find that instead of the appropriation which we have provided for in this bill being large enough, we shall have to increase it.

Mr. DAYTON. This bill carries $7,600,000 for the construction of machinery and ships already authorized.

Mr. HULICK. Yes; it already carries over $7,000,000, and the next one, for repairs of docks and repairs of ships and keeping up the Navy which we have, will not be $7,000,000 only, but over $10,000,000, I apprehend. Thus we see that the total displacement of vessels in commission or being fitted out at this time is about double what it was in 1885, while the modern ships under the cost of maintenance per ton displacement will be vastly greater. It therefore behooves us to look well to the question of "construction and repair" while we are making contracts for new ships.

TORPEDO BOATS.

This bill provides for 15 torpedo boats. The United States has now only 2. I submit to the members of this House as a business proposition, as a reasonable, common-sense view of the situation, whether we ought not now provide for a much larger number of these boats. Their services are greatly appreciated by officers of the Navy, and in time of war they are indispensable.

The following table shows the number of torpedo boats of foreign navies as compared with our own:

Countries.	Torpedo boats.
	In service.	Authorized and building.
Argentina	21	6
Austria	64	6
Brazil	22
Chile	22	Some.
China	23
Denmark	29	2
France	218	54
Germany	121	8
Great Britain	189	62
Italy	184	5
Japan	40	17
Netherlands	39	3
Russia	174	16
Spain	22	22
Sweden-Norway	38	20
	1,206	221+
United States	2	7

This table, Mr. Chairman, affords us a lesson. France has 218 and is building 54; Great Britain has 189 in service and 62 under construction; Spain has 22 and is building 22 more, and she is now "making mouths" at this country because we have accorded belligerent rights to Cuba.

It will be seen that the fifteen other countries mentioned have altogether 1,206 torpedo boats in service. The United States has only 2 and is building only 7 more.

Now, what does my friend say, and what do gentlemen claim, when we have appropriated in this bill for 15 torpedo boats? In the act of March 2, 1895, there were 3 torpedo boats provided for, to cost not to exceed $175,000, and these 3 were in addition to the other 3 and 1 submarine torpedo boat. That makes 7. There were 6 light-draft composite gunboats of about a thousand tons displacement, not to cost more than $230,000, in all $1,380,000, exclusive of armor, and 2 seagoing coast-line battle ships to cost not to exceed $4,000,000. There are other appropriations that I could refer to. Then there were these new battle ships under construction or contract at a cost not to exceed $4,000,000 each, and which were contracted for at about $5,250,000 for the 2. That is the present status of our Navy.

Now, it is recommended that the sum of $332,000 be appropriated and made immediately available for the improvement of our navy-yards, wherever needed. We have 6 first-class battle ships already, the armored cruiser Brooklyn, the New York, the ram Katahdin——

Mr. HANLY. Have we 6 battle ships now in commission? Is it not a fact that the only battle ship that we have in commission at this time is the Indiana?

Mr. HULICK. We have at this time the Indiana, the Maine, the Iowa, the Oregon——

Mr. HANLY. Are they in commission?

Mr. HULICK. No; the Iowa and the Oregon are not in commission. We have the Indiana, the Maine, and the Texas; but we have two battle ships under construction at this time. The Iowa is to be launched on next Saturday over at the navy-yard of the Cramp Bros., in Philadelphia.

Mr. HANLY. Is it not a fact that we have but one battle ship in commission. namely, the Indiana?

Mr. HULICK. At the time this report was issued the Indiana was awaiting commission. She was placed in commission and sent down to Port Royal, and will be docked there if she can be gotten into the dock.

Mr. HANLY. That is the only one we have in commission?

Mr. HULICK. No; as I said, we have the Indiana, Maine, and Texas.

Mr. HANLY. We have contracted for two more, but the keels are not laid.

Mr. HULICK. Now, in addition to that we have the 2 armored cruisers (Brooklyn and New York), we have 1 armored ram (Katahdin), we have 6 armored vessels, 6 double-turreted monitors, and 13 single-turret iron monitors. We have 16 unarmored steel vessels, one of which is that queen of the sea, the Minneapolis, with a speed of over 23 knots per hour—the fastest ship in the world to-day. I had the honor and great pleasure, with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and others of our committee, of being on that "flying monster of the deep" upon her trial trip two years ago—the pride of the ocean, the pride of our Navy, the representative of American genius, American skill, American ingenuity, American progress. Such a production was made possible only by the encouragement given our American talent and enterprise by the protective policy of the Republican party. We have in addition 2 torpedo boats, 7 under contract, and 15 provided for in this bill, making in all 24 torpedo boats. For all these that are built and those to be constructed more liberal appropriations must be made in the future than have been in the past.

Mr. LOW. I want to ask the gentleman what is the size of these torpedo boats?

Mr. HULICK. Well, my dear sir, I refer you to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, where you can learn all these facts for yourself.

Mr. LOW. Can you give me the length of them?

Mr. HULICK. Oh, yes; but if you will examine the report of the Secretary you will find all those facts. My time is limited and I can not yield.

Mr. LOW. I have the report. Torpedo boats vary in size. Can you give me the size it is intended to make these?

Mr. HULICK. Of course they vary in size. The Secretary is to use his discretion in this regard, and to build them as the best interest of the service may require.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. It is right on the same line that I desire to ask a question. I do not desire to criticise nor to ask how many feet there are, but I wish you would specify the class of these unarmored boats.

Mr. HULICK. I have not time to do so now. You can find that in the bill, and where it is not provided for, discretion is given to the Secretary of the Navy to determine the character of the vessel.

Mr. DAYTON. I will state to the gentleman that five of them are to be first class in every particular.

Mr. LOW. But a small boat can be first class.

Mr. HULICK. My time is limited, and I can not yield for other questions.

There is another matter to be considered in this connection. These boats have not only to be constructed and paid for, but they have got to be manned, and those men have to be put upon the pay roll and paid, and that will require money. Now, what about our enlisted men? In the Fifty-third Congress we provided for the enlistment of 1,000 men. They have already been enlisted, and 1,000 additional are provided for in this bill. There are now in our Navy, officers and men, including marines, 13,460 only.

England has 88,850; they have 70,000 in France; they have 21,000—I will only give round numbers—in Germany. They have in Italy 24,000; and if these 24,000 sailors do no better fighting than the Italian soldiers did the other day in their campaign over in Abyssinia they do not deserve to be ranked among the navies of the world. One of our American battle ships, armed with an American crew, could drive the whole Italian fleet in confusion before it. Men who are drafted into the service are mere machines. We have now about 1,100 marines. Take them out and we have 12,360 men in our Navy. Several thousand more will be required on the new ships; and we can get them as quicky as we can get the ships.

But the gentleman says it is not a question of cost. I will admit if we had war at this time it would not be a question of cost. It was not a question of cost when the rebellion was brought upon us. Then we got all the men we wanted, and we got all the money we wanted; and if there were a war to-day—if it were announced at this moment, while I am addressing this House, that a fleet was on its way from England, or any other great fleet to which reference has been made—you could get all the volunteers you needed from every section of our country and no foreign navy that floats could get within gunshot of our shores.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I yield fifteen minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HULICK. I say that when the time comes for money we can get it, and when the time comes for men we can get them. And we will not have to sell bonds to foreign syndicates to raise the money, for we can get all we want in this country, and we can have all the men we want—not conscripts, but men from every station in life—educated, business, patriotic men, who are invincible in war as they are influential in peace. But let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to gentlemen of this House, we are not going to have a war. England does not want war. With her splendid navy she does not want war. She would not have it. To-day the morning papers announce that Lord Salisbury is perfecting measures to have a settlement of the Venezuelan question on the plan suggested by the President of the United States, and have it arbitrated.

There are too many interests in common between that country and this—financial, social, educational, religious, commercial, and a thousand others—that will always, I trust, stand between our people and theirs. If a war were proclaimed to-day, every cross-road schoolhouse would echo with the voice of patriots called to arms, and, whether on land or sea, our country's honor would be maintained and our flag wave in triumph on every sea. But, Mr. Chairman, no navy on the face of God's footstool will ever cross the Atlantic or any other ocean to attack this country. When the time comes we are ready to defend ourselves. We are going right on to build ships, to build up our Navy. It is not to be inferred that because this bill provides for 4 instead of 6 battle ships more that the Navy is to suffer. Every man on the Naval Committee is an ardent friend of the Navy. It will not suffer in their hands. But the number of battle ships to be built now is purely a business proposition.

Mr. HEPBURN. If those nations are never going to come here, why do we need battle ships at all? [Laughter.]

Mr. HULICK. We need them for the purpose of protection.

Mr. HEPBURN. Protection from what? You say nobody is going to come here.

Mr. HULICK. We need them to protect our commerce on the seas and our citizens in their lives and property in foreign countries.

The gentleman who was last on the floor said that we wanted ships to send over to Armenia; that we stand powerless here, making recommendations and declarations which we can not enforce, and he spoke of our want of power in European waters. Does not the gentleman know that the Minneapolis is now in Turkish waters to aid the Christian Armenians in that country of bloodshed and murder? She carried there that Christian woman, Miss Barton, of this city, who is there as the representative of the Red Cross Society, supported by the prayers of millions of good people all over the world—that little woman, weak in body but strong in faith, with the Bible in one hand and the cross in the other; and to-day she is carrying the contributions of the Christian people of this land to give money and food and consolation to the dying Christians of Armenia. We do not want war ships to send there. We have the Minneapolis there with shot and shell and our flag waving over her, and no one dares to lay his hand upon that noble Christian woman and her faithful escort.

Mr. HANLY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HULICK. Not now. I "will see you later."

Mr. HANLY. I "will see you later." [Laughter.]

Mr. HULICK. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the trouble? Why can we not build all the ships now that we want? It was proclaimed a few days ago over the waters by our ambassador that protection emptied our Treasury. We know very well that the Treasury is empty, and that is the reason we can not build more ships and as fast as we want them. During this Administration we have borrowed over two hundred and sixty-two and a half million dollars. It is true that we have a gold monument one hundred millions high standing in the Treasury as the representative of the monetary power and wealth of this country, and, if necessary to defend our country and our flag, we could borrow all the money we might want; but shall we do it in time of profound peace? Mr. Chairman, can any gentleman within the sound of my voice point to an instance where protection depleted our Treasury?

The history of our country tells us when and how the Treasury has been depleted. Go back to 1861. What depleted the Treasury when the Democratic party was in power under James Buchanan? Was it protection or was it free trade? When the war came on protection was adopted, and through the Administrations of Lincoln and Grant and every other Administration down to that of Mr. Cleveland the credit of the nation was maintained, the public debt diminished, liberal pensions were paid to our soldiers, and our Treasury was filled with money. Whether the present Speaker of this House shall be elected our next President, or whether it shall be a candidate from New York or from Iowa, or whether we elect our candidate from Ohio, that sterling patriot and advocate of protection, Governor McKinley, we will give such protection to American labor and American industries as will fill our Treasury, restore our credit, and we can then build all the ships we may want.

Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just.

And, Mr. Chairman, I want to indorse at this time the President of the United States, as I gave him my vote on the 17th of December last, when he sent to the Congress his message in regard to Venezuela. Here is what he said:

> In order that such an examination should be prosecuted in a thorough and satisfactory manner, I suggest that the Congress make an adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay. When such report is made and accepted it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist, by every means in its power, as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests, the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which, after investigation, we have determined of right belongs to Venezuela. In making these recommendations I am fully aware of the responsibility assumed by me and realize all the consequences that may follow.

The President was right. He did not stop to inquire whether we had fifty ships or a thousand. He knew he was right and that the people of this country would indorse him. And Great Britain, instead of declaring war, declares she is ready to settle the matter by arbitration.

This country of ours, Mr. Chairman, educated as it is to be always on the right side of every question, and certain as it is to take the right side and to assert the cause that is just, need have no fear of the nations of Europe. When we are on the right side of any controversy, whether it be with England or with France or with Spain or with any other nation, we are ready to enforce our view, and the powers of the world will never question our attitude.

When this Congress indorses the resolutions to recognize the belligerency of the Cuban patriots no country will dare to come in and take the part of Spain. They may threaten, they may send their squadrons into American waters to protect their citizens, but not one of them will dare to come in and act with Spain against our country. I repeat, I want to indorse our President when he is right, though we could not heretofore indorse his foreign policy.

In the Hawaiian matter he was wrong. He had not gotten used at that time to setting up the flag, and when it was a question as to whether that flag should stand where it had been set up on those islands, floating in the free air of heaven, the President said "No," and it had to come down, and the country condemned him for that. But whenever he is right we are ready to stand by him and give him men and money. "It takes a real live man to govern this country," was the saying of our ambassador in Great Britain the other day. If he had said that it takes a real live man to govern the Democratic party he would have been about right.

When we were discussing certain resolutions the other day in regard to the utterances of our representative in Great Britain, it was intimated that if those resolutions were adopted that gentleman would become the Democratic candidate for President, but I say to my Democratic friends that when they go to Chicago and look all around them they can not find, either in the Democratic party or in the Free Coinage party, or in the Populist party, another man who can control them as well as Grover Cleveland has tried to do during his term of office. Your party, gentlemen, would have gone to pieces and the country would have gone to pieces if you had not had there a man just like him. If Ambassador Bayard, instead of saying that the American people need a strong man to control them had said that it requires a real live man to control the Democratic party, he would have been right.

Whether the President was right or wrong in his Venezuelan message, we voted $100,000 to sustain him. In some other matters we can not sustain him. In his pension policy we say he is wrong. We condemn that policy; and the people condemn it. In his home missionary work he was right. I honor any President of the United States who, with the great affairs of office upon him, can go to New York and there preside over a Christian assemblage such as the Home Missionary Society. I commend him for it. He said that he had a father who was a preacher and he remembered the prayers of that father, and those prayers carried him into the great Presidential chair. So when he was called upon by those good Christian people he went to New York and presided over that assemblage. I mention it to his credit, though I can not indorse his reflections upon the Western people. His criticisms were unjust, impolitic, and unworthy of the President of the United States.

The highest standard of morality and civilization is found in the sturdy people who have built up our Western country. The church, the schools, and colleges are their just pride. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that the question now under consideration is a business proposition. This bill will be adopted as it is reported. The Senate will pass it, the President will approve it, the country will indorse it. And our Navy will continue to be improved until our ships will deck every sea and our flag float in every harbor of the world. [Great applause.]

Mr. HANLY. I yield twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Committee on Naval Affairs on having made some provision for an increase of the American Navy. It was a timely and judicious act on their part. But they were entirely too conservative in their action. They did not go far enough either to please the people or to meet the exigencies of the times. There is a feeling of unrest all over the world. There are small or large conflicts now going on in every quarter of the habitable globe—Jameson against Kruger in the Transvaal; Italy against Abyssinia; England against the Soudanese; France against Madagascar and Siam; Russia wherever the bear can penetrate; the Armenian uprising causing trouble to Turkey; and near our borders Spain and Cuba engaged in an internecine war. Wherever the eye ranges it sees the red of carnage and the desolation of war.

Millions of soldiers are waiting the trumpet call and hundreds of ships the signal gun to engage in deadly combat. The peace of Europe and of the world rests to-day in the brain of two monarchs suffering from disease, either of whom may, in delirium of fever or twinges of pain, light the torch of a war from ocean to ocean, from hemisphere to hemisphere, exceeding any known to man.

If any such war does come, we need a navy powerful enough to protect our commerce, our people, and our national honor from the infuriated hordes on land and the fiery cruisers on sea let loose by czar or kaiser. In this mad race to get into a row with somebody we have not been much behind our kingly neighbors. With a most cheerful disregard of our condition we declared war, in effect, upon Great Britain about Venezuela in just three minutes by the clock. [Laughter.] We then declared war, in effect, upon all of Europe except Spain about the Armenian massacres in exactly two hours and forty minutes. And then, in order not to be partial and in order to show that we thought we could whip the whole world, we, in effect, declared war against Spain regarding Cuba in exactly one hour and ten minutes. [Laughter.] In doing that we were utterly forgetful of the fact that our Navy was in such a condition that if we should enter into a war with any first-class country about all we could say after the first encounter would be what the boy said at school to his larger antagonist, "Well, you can't get up and go away and say you didn't have any fight, even if you did whip me." [Laughter.]

We have ignored the precepts of Washington. We have departed from the uniform course of the Republic since it was formed, of noninterference in the affairs of foreign powers. We have stretched the Monroe doctrine until it has become so attenuated that its author himself could slip through the threads of the doctrine and never know where he was. [Laughter.] We have launched ourselves boldly into the ring of nations, claiming to be a first-class power, not only in the New World but in the Old World as well.

Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned I am not worried particularly. I have no particular fault to find with the existing order of things or the action taken so far by the House. I am as proud of my country as any man, and believe in its mighty power as firmly as any enthusiastic supporter of the jingo policy. Our position having been taken, I stand by the vote and the record we have made. But are we quite ready to maintain ourselves in the position we have undertaken to assume? We have a small, an insignificant Navy. It is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. It is not very large; in fact, there is not much of it as compared with other nations or with our needs and our wealth, our strength and our duties.

In 1853, when Franklin Pierce was nominated for President of the United States, the New York Herald, in speaking of him, said that Mr. Pierce was a very large man in the State of New Hampshire, but when you came to spread him all over the United States the ground showed up in spots. [Laughter.] And so of our Navy. It is a very good Navy as far as it goes, but when you come to spread it all over the world, the oceans and countries show up altogether in too many places to make that Navy a thing of extraordinary value to us in case we should be engaged in a foreign war. We want something more than what we now have.

I have listened carefully to the speeches and have read many of them made at this session, speeches like that made by my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. HULICK] a few moments ago, about the honor of our flag, and about its beauty, and all that sort of thing; about our country's greatness, our schoolhouses, and our churches, and we have heard from time to time that when the note of war was sounded we would simply stamp on the ground and immediately millions of soldiers and hundreds of ships would come floating through the air in order to defend our frontiers. All of which I recognize as very pretty poetry of speech and very beautiful in thought and expression. While, however, it stirred my pulses and roused my patriotism, as was intended by the speakers, I could only say, as Marshal Saint Arnaud said of the charge of the Six Hundred at Balaklava, "It is very beautiful, but it is not war." [Applause.]

Just imagine for a moment that we were engaged in war with a foreign country; imagine that the time comes of which my friend from Ohio speaks so eloquently, and that an armed fleet is coming across the Atlantic to assail our unprotected seacoast, and see what would be the result if we follow his advice. Imagine Gen. Nelson A. Miles of the Army and Admiral Ramsay of the Navy embarking on a pilot boat, cruising out into the harbor of New York robed in the gaudy folds of the American flag, one of them reading aloud the eloquent speech of that Senator who said that he had lost his father in one war and was willing to lose his son in another, the other reading the speech of that other Senator who wanted the shots from our cannon to enter the seraglio of the Sultan of Turkey to carry deliverance to that people, and both reciting the speech of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK], who talked so eloquently just now of schoolhouses and patriotism and churches and Clara Barton, and all that sort of thing, in the vain endeavor to hypnotize the advancing fleet of ironclads, and thus prevent the looting of the commercial center of the United States. [Laughter.] Why, even our honored President, if he should wave in one hand the Declaration of Independence and in the other the national ensign, and undertake to repeat in basso profundo voice Drake's apostrophe to the American flag, while his entire Cabinet circled round him and sang the Star Spangled Banner to the strains of the Marine Band, could not prevent Washington being sacked a second time by the English fleet if we were to declare war again upon Great Britain unless he was backed by ironclads. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the only way to maintain ourselves, the only way to set at naught the powers that may combine against us, is to have battle ships, and plenty of them, and accentuate the patriotic speeches we make with the thunders of our cannon from the ships of our Navy, and so believing, I deem it essential that we should have a large Navy, and most cheerfully support the committee's recommendation and the amendment offered by my friend from Indiana [Mr. HANLY], who so eloquently addressed you this afternoon.

We read of British consuls in foreign lands spreading the British flag on the ground and defying their enemies successfully, and saving the consulate and people and property therein from injury and death, and we read of them sometimes protecting American citizens from insult and from violence by spreading that flag above them. Why is it? It is because of the power that is behind that flag. It is because that all over the world it is known that you may kill a British consul, you may destroy a British flag and make quick work of it, but within a longer or a shorter time the red cross of St. George, floating from the masthead of a British man-of-war, will make that cross grow redder yet in the blood of the assassins of the Englishman or the insulter of the English banner. [Applause.] We ought to make our flag respected just as much as is that of the greatest of foreign nations respected. We demand that the emblem of our country shall float as proudly as any, and forever stand as an evidence that back of it is a power that will not be insulted and will not allow its citizens to be molested. [Applause.]

I can remember the massacre of the crew of the Virginius in Cuba, and felt then, as I feel now, ashamed of my country because it did not protect its people as they ought to be protected in a foreign land, and as they must and shall be protected in the future if we are true to ourselves, our history, and our nation. [Applause.] But they say we have not money enough. Good God! if we have not, let us borrow it. It is easy enough to borrow it to pay salaries. Let us borrow it to pay for ships. Let us borrow it, and not discuss this question simply and solely as though it was partisan politics. Do not say always that when we Republicans come into power then we will be able to build ships. Do not postpone the day of doing good. Borrow the money if necessary. The American people will sustain us, because they always sustain the party that protects the American flag, the American honor, and the American citizen. [Applause.]

We all know that the brightest pages of American history are those whereon are inscribed the records of the achievements of the American Navy. Starting from the Revolutionary times, who has not had his blood thrilled with patriotic joy as he read of the conflict of the Bon Homme Richard with the Serapis; who has not waved his hat in triumph as he cheered and cheered again for John Paul Jones, the victor in that bloody battle. [Applause.] Coming down to 1812, who is it that has not echoed again and again the words of Senator Stockton, of New Jersey, when he said:

> Who was it in the dark days of 1812, when your armies on shore were covered with disgrace and defeat, when Winchester had been defeated, when Hull had surrendered, and the whole Northwest was open to the incursions of a savage and a foreign foe—who was it that bearded the British lion in his den and waked the echoes of old Albion's cliffs with the thunders of his cannon and the shouts of his victory? It was the American sailor.

[Applause.]

The names of Decatur and of Perry come down to us now as the heroes of our country's second struggle with the mother country. [Applause.]

In the rebellion, who does not remember the deeds of Foote and of Porter and of grand old Farragut [applause] when they carried the flag past the ironclad batteries of Vicksburg; when they carried the flag through the mouth of the Mississippi; when they stormed the forts at Mobile, and proved that the valor of 1776 and 1812 was equal if not excelled by the sailors of 1861 to 1865. [Applause.] And in our later days, who is it that was not proud of Fighting Bob Evans when he cleared his ship for action in Valparaiso and said his sailors must be protected? [Applause.] Who is it that was not proud of Admiral Benham in Rio de Janeiro when he said to the commanders of the ships in that harbor, that outnumbered, outmanned, and outclassed him, that he would take the American trader into port and let them fire upon the flag if they dared, and did it. [Applause.]

We are all proud of them. We were and are proud of our sailors; we were and are proud of our Navy, and proud of its history. We believe that the sailors of to-day would write new records of victory upon the history of our Navy and of our country; that they would inscribe new glories upon historic tablets; that they would do all that men could do. [Applause.] But, as Napoleon said, "God fights on the side of the heaviest battalions," so our small Navy would magnificently sink beneath the shots of the overwhelming force of many a foreign country, refusing to surrender, but unable to conquer. [Applause.] The day of miracles has passed. There are no Davids, no Goliaths, at the present time. They can not be duplicated. You can not sling pebbles against the shot of rifled cannon and have any hope of success in the engagement. [Laughter.] We might be as bold, we might be as valorous as the celebrated bull, the very proudest of his race, the gamest and strongest of the bovine tribe, who charged upon the locomotive, believing it was interfering with his vested rights in the field wherein he pastured. After the collision, in the language of the poem detailing Casabianca's fate, they said:

That bull, oh where was he?

[Laughter.]

So it would be with our Navy if we undertook to engage in conflict with the navies of foreign nations. We would ask, "Our Navy, where is it?" for it would be gone from our gaze forever more. The cheese box of Ericsson is the nearest approach to a miracle of modern times, and it might be that the genius of Ericsson could be dimmed by that of the more modern inventor in excelling the almost miraculous production of the destroyer of the Merrimac by presenting some new electrical coast defender; but it is not safe to take any chances. We need a strong navy so as to be prepared for any event at any time regardless of our hope from the wizard of the day. We are preeminently fitted to have and maintain a powerful navy by our country, our climate, and our situation, and all demand one at our hands.

Ever since this session began we have been acting like a boy at school with a chip on his shoulder, walking around and asking somebody to knock it off. [Laughter.] We have paraded ourselves among the nations of the earth, interfering in foreign affairs, admitting that in so doing we were leaving the landmarks of the nation in order to interfere in the affairs of foreign countries—something we never sought to do before—and we must be prepared to fight if the chip is knocked off our shoulder. I have been told by the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that in a certain friendly game that it is said is played in Washington it is unwise to bluff too often, because you will be called and lose if you do. [Laughter.] Now, in this bluff that we are playing with the nations of the earth somebody may call us, and where shall we be when the bluff is called? [Laughter.] We may say that our cause is just; we may say that it is Freedom's cause; we may say, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK]:

Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just.

That sounds good and grand, either on the stage or in a speech. But let me tell my friend that in the years I have passed upon this earth I have always found that a well-sharpened sword or a well-oiled and loaded revolver for a man, or a strong army and a powerful navy for a nation, will beat a thrice-armed just quarreler every day in the year. [Applause.]

Hence we need a strong navy; because, although our cause may be so just that the very angels in heaven will sing psalms of joy that America has so just a cause, unless we have something besides a just cause to defend ourselves with, the devils in hell will laugh at our discomfiture, and tell us that we deserved it because we were not prepared for the trouble that we brought upon ourselves. [Laughter and applause.] The more ships the better. You can not have too many for the American people. I prefer 16 to 6; I prefer 6 to 4. I prefer 50 torpedo boats to 15. They are all needed; they can all be used—every one of them. And if we can not get armor plate enough now, let us offer a premium to some man to invent armor plate, and see if we can not get it.

Is it possible—is it not a libel on American intelligence and enterprise to say that we can not get armor plate enough? Why, when I heard the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK] make that statement—that we could not get armor plate enough to cover the six ships—I looked around this House, hoping to see the tall form of the gentleman from Iowa, who made so eloquent a speech the other day in defense of protection, rise to his full height and say, "You are mistaken; because protection will give us any amount of armor plate." [Laughter and applause.] I expect we can get it; and I say to you it is a mere subterfuge, if you will pardon the expression, to cover up the real issue and prevent the necessary increase of the Navy. It is because, in the language of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANLY], you are afraid of close Congressional districts in these United States. You are afraid of the effect upon the people of the country; you are afraid to spend more money. You are going ahead with this "do-nothing" policy in the hope of hoodwinking the people, which I do not think you can, for the people believe in a do-something policy. [Applause.]

A large increase in the Navy is a good thing in another aspect of the case. It will relieve the congested state of the Navy Department, so far as its officers are concerned. The personnel of the Navy is loudly clamoring for reform. The Engineer Corps of the Navy, as my friend from New York [Mr. WILSON] on my right knows, is clamoring for reform and for needed legislation. We can not hope to give it in any other way than by having more ships. Men are now growing gray in the service as ensigns and lieutenants, with no hope of promotion. New ships and new torpedo boats will give work for all the officers. It will allow ambitious and deserving young officers to become captains, commanders, commodoers, and even admirals before the time comes for them to retire from the service because they have outlived their usefulness. A large increase in the Navy, in building more ships and torpedo boats, will give employment to thousands of workingmen, and thus help the country. God knows we have too many idle men in the United States now. The tramp of the unemployed is heard on the pavements of every city of this nation, striking terror to the heart of the taxpayer and causing sorrow to every lover of humanity.

It is the duty of the Government to aid them if it can. I do not believe in socialism; I do not believe in paternalism; but I think when the Government can give employment to the deserving poor of the land the Government ought to do it. [Applause.] No Government is entitled to the support, the respect, or the confidence of its citizens unless it cares for those citizens in woe as well as in weal. In every aspect of the case, then, these additions should be made. Let us make our Navy an instrument of war, and not a plaything of peace. Our Navy, compared with that of most foreign nations, is like the caravels of Columbus compared with the famous White Squadron, which we own and of which we are so justly proud. Sir Francis Drake sailed around the world in the wooden vessel Pelican. The stories of his victories recount one continued march of triumph wherever he went, and sound like fairy tales. The Pelican was a grand ship of its time. To-day the Pelican would be no match for the smallest armored boat that we have. And so with our Navy. It is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough, compared with the navies of other nations of the world. We are in a condition compared with them like Sir Francis Drake's Pelican compared with us.

I want to see an American ship on every sea, carrying our glorious banner around the world, keeping in line everywhere with the noise of the drumbeat of Britain's power, the symbol of freedom everywhere, the hope of patriots in every land, the pride of every American, the protector of every American citizen everywhere on this earth, regardless of his color or condition. [Applause.] In olden times the words "I am a Roman citizen" protected any man when he uttered them, whether on the banks of the Euphrates or on those of the storied Rhine, whether on the plains of Persia or in the mountains of Spain. Why, in that ancient day to be a Roman was greater than a king. [Applause.] I want the announcement "I am an American citizen" to be as the Roman cry was in the day of the Cæsars—a title of nobility, an armor of defense, a sword of protection, a shield for the weak and suffering, the undying glory of this great nation, man's last and best attempt at self-government. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I now yield ten minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have heard with great pleasure the eloquent forensic song and dance given to us by the young gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANLY] and the brilliant remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. If you will review the legislative record since constitutional government began on this side of the Atlantic and discussions about appropriations for the Navy were first recorded, I doubt if you will find more encomiums or a stronger defense of what the immortal Lincoln called "Uncle Sam's webfoot"—the Navy—than have been spoken upon this floor during the present debate. There has rarely been—as occurs with the Army, the other branch of the service—a strong defender of the Navy upon the floor of this House. It is a very glittering subject; one filled with glamour and romance. A man can easily make a speech full of statistical and historical canned goods [laughter] about the magnificent achievements of the United States Navy. He can go back to the time of Paul Jones and run the gamut of true heroics down to the day of the brave old Admiral Farragut, and it all reflects fadeless credit upon the patriotism, the bravery, and the courage of the American people, and the officers, seamen, and marines of the American Navy.

But, Mr. Chairman, we come now, in discussing the amendment, to a cold, plain question of what appropriations we shall make for the increase of this branch of the service. No committee of this House, I think, has given more careful, more industrious, or more arduous labor to the work intrusted to it than has the Committee on Naval Affairs and its able chairman. There was a difference of opinion in the committee as to the number of battle ships that we should authorize. I am free to say that I was myself at first favorable to an appropriation for six ships.

Mr. HANLY. Did you not so vote in the subcommittee?

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I did so vote in the subcommittee.

Mr. HANLY. What changed your mind?

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I did so vote there, and I am perfectly willing to accept the responsibility of it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the Chair and to the Committee of the Whole that, while I have no objection of course to the disclosure of anything that was done in the committee, yet if we were to enter upon that sort of discussion here it would not only be very much contrary to usage, but it might lead to a discursive kind of debate that would not be useful. It is customary for the members of a committee to bring only their conclusions into the House. Of course, in reaching conclusions, different gentlemen often take different views of a subject, but it is not necessary to discuss in open House the statements or the arguments that may have been employed in the committee from the beginning of the consideration of a question until the conclusion was reached. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Indiana and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this discussion had better be confined to the desirability of making the appropriation proposed by the committee.

Mr. HANLY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that I shall be the judge of my conduct, and do not ask advice from him.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, Mr. Chairman, I thought a suggestion would be enough, but now I shall reluctantly make the point of order that it is not in order, in a debate in the House, to refer to discussions or proceedings that took place in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this interlocutory matt er does not come out of my time, I hope. [Laughter.] Now, sir, I am as familiar as other gentlemen with the magnificent display made all around the world by that great naval power, England. I have been around the world, and know it is round [laughter], and in every part of the world and on every sea, wherever there is an English keel, there follows an English commercial interest, and back of that to protect it is the whole power of the most magnificent navy in the world. I have seen England's fleets in the Mediterranean, at Cape Town, in Australia, and in British India. I have seen them in the harbor of Hongkong, in the Orient. I have seen them in the land Rudyard Kipling says—

East of Suez, where the best is like the worst,
Where there aren't no Ten Commandments, an' a man can raise a thirst;
On the road to Mandalay,
Where the old flotilla lay;
On the road to Mandalay,
Where the flyin'-fishes play,
An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the bay!

[Laughter.]

I have noticed her mailed fleets flying, not what the gentleman from California calls "the red cross of St. George," because the English national marine does not fly any red cross, but a white flag, in every quarter of the globe. That, however, is not material. I have seen all this. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not afraid of England or of the English navy, and the American people are not afraid of her or of her navy. In the great Olympian race of nations we are not going to compete with her in this enormous nautical militarism. We fear her not. I recall a story in regard to President Jackson. He was riding one day with the French minister around the environs of Washington, when riding there was not so pleasant as it is now. Jackson, with all his other accomplishments in Americanism, did not understand any French, but he had an interpreter, a secretary, riding at his side who did the French act for him, and while this secretary and the French minister were conversing very animatedly old Jackson, with his cloak wrapped around him, was in a state of quietude. After a while, however, he turned to the secretary and asked: "What is he jabbering about?" The secretary replied, "Mr. President, he was telling me how a French fleet could come up the broad sweep and reaches of the Potomac, get within gunshot of the capital, and how easy it would be for such a foreign fleet to take the capital." Old Jackson, that iron-nerved, lion-hearted old patriot, turned around to the secretary and said, "Take hell!" [Laughter.]

So, Mr. Chairman, the American people will reply when they are threatened with the English navy, or with the French navy, or with all the navies of the world united. To conjure up these suppositious dangers has no fear for the true American patriot. I am in favor of increasing our Navy liberally, sufficiently to make it a constabulary on the high seas for protecting our commerce and defending our flag, but for any purposes of minatory, warlike action, or of vain military display, I am opposed to it, and my people are opposed to it. They are in favor, as I am in favor, of just appropriations for the purpose of giving us a modern Navy that will give effective surveillance to all of our maritime interests, but not for the purpose of vaingloriously racing with England; not for the purpose of competing with the Continental powers in any display of extravagant militarism. I represent a constituency where there is, perhaps, the largest number in any one district of the people known as "The Society of Friends." They believe, conscientiously, in peace, in arbitration, and that war is simply organized savagery. They believe in the words put into the mouth of Richelieu by Bulwer Lytton:

Beneath the rule of men entirely great,
The pen is mightier than the sword.

They dream the dream of the true statesman, and by tenets and creed strive to hasten the day described by Tennyson, "when universal peace shall lie like a great shaft of light across the land." That the world is not to-day abreast of their faith is because it is not abreast of the teachings of the Prince of Peace. A great navy, tempting us to embroilment and foreign war, is one thing; a navy of modern construction and sufficient in size to protect our coast line and commerce, is another. I believe the American people, respecting the advice of the fathers of the Republic so far as applicable to the changed conditions to-day, desire the latter; and even though they do not, the "jingoist" who represents them is subject to the limitations of a reduced reserve and cofferless Treasury. Although nearly 90 per cent of any appropriation contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana would be expended in my own State; although in my own district and county magnificent ships can be built, I hesitate to support the increase. At Chester some of our finest vessels have been built, both for our national and commercial navy, among them that magnificent vessel, the finest ship of its class that ever sailed the sea, "a thing of beauty and a joy forever," whose builder was maligned and, through the action of the Democratic Secretary of the Navy, hampered and halted in the payment for it—the United States steamer Dolphin. Both builder and ship have been vindicated. It has been demonstrated by the present Secretary, Mr. Herbert, that of her class there is no vessel excelling her. She first ran from the ways of the shipbuilder into the tide water of the Delaware in one of the counties of my district. Nothing ever appertaining to her was "structurally weak" save the vicious attacks made upon her and her builder—that grand old man, the father of the American modern navy and faithful friend of protection—the late John Roach. [Applause.]

I feel that in voting for four ships now, instead of six, we go to the extreme limit, if we take into consideration the fact, among other arguments, that the types of modern vessels are constantly and quickly changing, and that possibly before these ships are built and launched there will be so radical a change in these fighting platforms, in these magnificent battle ships—into which we put millions of dollars—that it may be that the money would be wasted, as it has been wasted, absolutely wasted, in the construction of other vessels before this. I take it that the committee's action was wise in coming to the conclusion in favor of four ships instead of six. I thought it would be prudent, at a time when the sentiment of the House seemed favorable to a moderate increase of the Navy, to vote in subcommittee for six ships rather than four; but I believe——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBINSON] has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I ask for two or three minutes more.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. But I believe now that the considerate judgment of the committee as reported in the bill is right. We wrestled with the question for a long time. We debated it in committee again and again, and we came to the conclusion finally that in authorizing 4 ships at this time (for, as the chairman of the committee will explain, we are practically undertaking to build 6 ships, the 2 provided for by the last Congress not having been fully appropriated for)—we are building 6 ships within a short space of time and we go far enough in the direction of increasing the Navy of this country—not increasing it for the purpose of war; not increasing it for the purpose of parading belligerently a navy around the world, but increasing it for the proper purpose, of policing the seas, of guarding our coasts, of looking out for the commercial interests of our country as against the predatory commercial disposition of England and the other great powers. We will receive the just approval of our constituents and of this Republic, which, upholding and defending the cause of self-government and civil liberty on this hemisphere, at the same time deprecates "jingoism" and all that savors of it. [Applause.]

Mr. HANLY. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, during the nine years that I have been a member of this House I have never failed to support the most liberal appropriations for the increase of the Navy. In one Congress I went so far as to vote with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] to recommit a naval appropriation bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs with instructions to report a provision for the construction of more ships.

I have listened here with great pleasure to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANLY]. It is a speech that gladdens my heart, coming as it does from the State of Indiana. We have heard far different music from that State in the years that are past. There has been here a statesman from Indiana who has boldly asserted upon the floor of this House that half a dozen canal boats were enough for the American Navy. His hatred of the Navy became almost proverbial.

I have listened with equal interest to the speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. It was melody from the Pacific Coast. These gentlemen have spoken of the present and the future; no one has spoken of the past. We must judge of the future by our experience in the past. The past shows that a strong navy is a vital necessity to every free and independent nation. From the day when the Greeks defeated the Persians in the Bay of Salamis down to the present time the navy has always been a vital factor in the history of nations. Hannibal crossed the Alps and descended upon the fertile plains of Italy. He remained there seventeen years—longer than Napoleon maintained his supremacy in Europe. He was at last defeated, not by Roman armies upon the Peninsula, but by the Roman galleys and triremes. A Roman navy transported the troops of Scipio from Italy to the African coast, changing the seat of war, and forcing the withdrawal of Hannibal. His decisive defeat at Zama was the result of the operations of the Roman navy.

Without a navy, sir, we never should have been successful in our Revolutionary war. In the darkest hour of our struggle then the sky was illumined with the flames of the Bon Homme Richard and the capture of the Serapis by Paul Jones. He kept the whole coast of England in continuous alarm with his little war ship. indeed, sir, from the day when William the Norman landed in England that country was never invaded until Paul Jones landed his sailors and plundered British estates.

But, sir, there was another navy that made its mark in our Revolutionary history. It was the French navy, under d'Estaing and the Comte de Grasse. It was the French navy that forced the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. Without the presence of the French navy there would have been no capitulation. Without the French navy the few British ships under the command of Admiral Howe at New York would have sailed up the Chesapeake and have relieved the British general from his untoward position. So it is that I say this country would not have been free and independent and the nation it is to-day without the assistance of the French navy.

Let us go a little further. After we had gained our independence France had her own revolution, upon which the structure of an empire was founded. Napoleon became emperor—the admiration and at the same time the fear of the world. We seem to believe that Wellington defeated Napoleon. Ah, Mr. Chairman, that is a great mistake. Wellington gained the battle of Waterloo, but the man primarily responsible for the destruction of Napoleon was Lord Nelson. The French fleet was the right arm of Napoleon, and Nelson repeatedly destroyed it. When Napoleon had secured an alliance with Holland an English fleet rendered the Dutch fleet useless. When the alliance with Denmark was made, and its purpose was to secure the assistance of the Danish fleet, it was Lord Nelson who bombarded Copenhagen and seized the Danish fleet. When the Emperor Paul of Russia was ready to make an alliance, it was Nelson in the Baltic who broke off the negotiations by threatening the Russian fleet.

It was Nelson who destroyed the French fleet in the Bay of Aboukir and shut up Napoleon in Egypt. It was Nelson who maintained English supremacy in the Mediterranean in spite of all of Napoleon's efforts against him. It was Nelson who caused England to disregard the provisions of the treaty of Amiens and retain her grip on the Island of Malta. It was Nelson who destroyed the Spanish fleet at St. Vincent and the combined Spanish and French fleets at Trafalgar. Napoleon's final destruction was due to Nelson and the British navy. France was isolated—cut off from the rest of the world by his operations. She had no intercourse with the outside world. She had neither exports nor imports. Her commerce was destroyed. She was compelled to feed upon herself. She was forced to furnish her own supplies, artillery, and munitions of war. Provisions and men finally gave out. France had exhausted herself, and Wellington finished the work begun by Nelson. It demonstrated the value of the British navy. It had won for England the greatest fight of modern times, and fastened upon her the greatest national debt in the whole world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us come down the aisles of time to the war of 1812. Is there anything on the land except Macomb's one fight at the Saranac upon which we can plume ourselves? The battle of New Orleans, remember, was fought after the treaty of Ghent. When Hull had surrendered at Detroit, when Scott had been captured after Lundy's Lane, when the American Army had been driven back across the Niagara, when Wilkinson had made his fiasco upon the border, and the whole nation was plunged in the darkness of gloom and despair, the glorious news of the victory of Perry on Lake Erie and of McDonough on Lake Champlain aroused the enthusiasm of the people anew and excited their patriotism to the utmost pitch. And there was glorious music on the ocean. Decatur, Barron, Bainbridge, Hull, Stewart, Porter, and a score of American naval heroes were driving home the iron pellets of liberty. These were the victories that forced England to the treaty of Ghent, and which made her acknowledge that thereafter American vessels should be free from search upon the high seas and American sailors free from danger of British impressment.

Now let us speak of our own internal troubles over thirty years ago. The Confederacy was ranged on one side and what was left of the Union on the other. Who segregated the Confederacy? Was it Sherman? Why, it had been torn in twain a year before the march to the sea; torn in twain by Farragut, Porter, and Foote. The Mississippi River had responded to the prediction made by John A. Logan on the floor of this House in 1861. It was again made a free American river. New Orleans was in the hands of Farragut before McClellan had got through fighting on the Peninsula. The American Navy closed the ports of the Confederacy and sealed them as the ports of France had been sealed by Nelson fifty years before. It was the American Navy that forced the victorious result. Without it there might have been to-day two confederacies, one North and the other South. With it the Union shall ever be preserved.

Mr. Chairman, I said in the beginning of my remarks that we must provide for the future in the light of the past. Within one year we have had a lesson in naval warfare which we should heed. The little Kingdom of Japan, with scarcely thirty-five millions of inhabitants, has overwhelmed the oldest, the richest, and the most populous Empire on the face of the globe. It did it within six months. Where would Japan have been but for her navy? It was the navy of Japan that did the work. The Yalu will live in history at the side of Trafalgar. Let us heed well the lesson.

There are war clouds on our own horizon. No matter who made them, they are there. If we work and act in accordance with what we have heretofore proclaimed on the floor of this House, we will make liberal provision for battle ships of similar type to those that destroyed the hope of China. We have been threatened by an island nation, the same as Japan, with a navy far more powerful. We have to-day at least three causes of irritation with that nation. There is the Venezuelan question, there is the boundary question in Alaska, and there is the question of our fur-seal fisheries. The Bering Sea Commission recommended an appropriation of over $400,000 to pay England for destroying our property in that sea, but the House voted down the proposition.

Did you mean it when you voted it down? Did you mean to accept the necessary and natural consequences arising from your action? If so, now is the time to show it. Did you mean it when you voted unanimously to sustain the recent declaration of the Monroe doctrine? If you did, prove it by your vote. [Applause.] Did you mean it when you bade defiance to Spain by your vote on the proposition to recognize the belligerency of the Cuban patriots? If so, enunciate it by your vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANLY]. If you mean business, do business, for this is the time and this the hour to do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, has the time on the other side been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The time on the other side is exhausted.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I will say but a few words. There are some things which it seems to me ought to be said. There is really no question here in regard to the desirability of going forward with the work of building up the American Navy. This bill brings an assurance to the House from the committee that we are heartily in favor of continuing this work. I have been somewhat identified with our progress in naval construction during the last twelve or thirteen years, and have generally been regarded as favorable to a liberal increase of our naval armament from time to time. I feel very much gratified at the pleasant references that have been made to my service in that regard by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANLY], my colleague from Ohio [Mr. HULICK], and others, and I desire to say to them and to this House that I feel great satisfaction and pride in having emulated all of the liberality and enthusiasm of my previous record in this regard by presenting to this House to-day for its consideration, and, as I confidently believe, for its indorsement, provision for the largest amount of tonnage and for the largest expenditure for ships of war ever requested of the House of Representatives or of the Senate of the United States.

The appropriation bill now pending in this House carries an authorization for 4 battle ships and 15 torpedo boats, which constitute an aggregate of about 45,600 to 46,000 tons of displacement. That is by far the largest authorization that has ever been made in the history of our naval progress in any one bill. I made a brief computation a few moments ago, by which I find that the largest amount of tonnage previously authorized was in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, when I had the honor of being chairman of the committee, when the authorization amounted to 33,550 tons. The largest previous authorization for the construction of ships amounted to only 25,600 tons. This act, as I said, carries an authorization for about 46,000 tons of the most expensive and powerful war ships ever authorized by this Government.

The same facts are true in regard to the liberality of provision for these vessels. I hold in my hand a statement in detail of the authorization of ships and the amounts appropriated in every bill since 1885. This statement covers all of the appropriations except those for the Chicago, the Dolphin, the Boston, and the Atlanta, which should be also included in the new Navy; but this statement begins with my service upon the committee.

Mr. HANLY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE. If it is only a brief one. I have but half the time which the gentleman had.

Mr. HANLY. Is it not a fact that the Fifty-first Congress, at its first and second sessions, appropriated or authorized, for the building of the new Navy, under the head of "Increase of the Navy" no less than $26,582,000?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not know why the gentleman should want to ask that question when I was about making the statement. I have the papers in my hand. I am not talking about how much was appropriated at any two or three or four sessions of Congress. I am speaking of the annual appropriation bills. When we have made another bill next year we shall know how much this Congress has appropriated.

Mr. HANLY. The fact is as I have stated.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am discussing the appropriation of this year, and as compared with any previous appropriation or any previous authorization of ships it is far the largest. The largest authorization of vessels prior to the Fifty-first Congress was in 1885, when the aggregate cost of all the vessels authorized was not to exceed $10,128,000. The next highest was in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, when we began the construction of battle ships and authorized three of them. That bill made an authorization limit of $15,225,000. The bill of March 3, 1885, which authorized an expenditure of $10,128,000, made appropriations for only $3,500,000, leaving the larger part of the appropriation to future years. The act of June 30, 1890, which provided for the first seagoing battle ships and which authorized an expenditure of $15,225,000, made an appropriation to carry forward that work of $8,120,000. I might follow down and say that the act of March 2, 1892, provided for the authorization of vessels to cost $7,500,000 as the outside limit exclusive of armament, and appropriated $4,900,000. The act of March 3, 1893, provided for 3 gunboats of 1,200 tons.

That was the parting contribution of the present distinguished Secretary of the Navy, who left the chairmanship of the Naval Committee of this House to accept his present Cabinet position. That bill provided for 3 gunboats of only 1,200 tons each, the authorization of expenditures being only $1,200,000, and the bill carried no appropriation for carrying on the work of the Navy on these and the vessels then under construction. We had a good deal more money in the Treasury then than we have now. The act of July, 1894, provided for no construction whatever. It was believed by the committee at that time, my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] then being the chairman, at the request of or suggestion of the President of the United States, that Congress should regard the depleted condition of the Treasury before entering upon any new obligations for expenditures of that kind, was sufficient justification for making no provision in that Congress for any new ships whatever; and the bill appropriated $9,955,000 for carrying on the work of the construction of vessels already authorized.

Then we had a change. I do not know that the political situation had anything to do with this matter, but between the second and third sessions of the Fifty-third Congress a great popular revulsion changed the complexion of the House of Representatives; and then we had the experience that the committee, which, on the 26th day of July, 1894, deferring to the recommendation of the President that we consider the depleted condition of the Treasury before providing for more ships, on March 2, 1895, when the Treasury certainly was not in a much better condition, they came in with a recommendation of 2 battle ships and 6 gunboats and authorizing an expenditure thereon of $5,905,000. They made an appropriation for carrying on the work upon vessels under construction, and a very small appropriation for making the plans, etc., of the 2 battle ships. The aggregate appropriation carried by the bill was $13,304,000.

Now, right there I want to call the attention of the House to a fact that is important in the consideration of the question now before us. As a matter of fact, while this committee authorizes in this bill the construction of four additional battle ships, this appropriation bill is really inaugurating the construction and providing for the beginning of the construction of six battle ships. The act of March 2, 1895, providing for two battle ships, did not appropriate any money for the construction of those vessels. It did provide a small sum, in one of the items constituting the aggregate of the appropriation bill, to carry on the work of drafting and designing these ships; and, although the Department was ready to advertise for bids for the construction of these vessels on the 2d day of March, 1895, they were not put under contract until the 2d day of January, 1896. No provision was made for their construction last year. We are making provision in this bill for the construction of those ships. We are carrying in this appropriation all the money that the Secretary of the Navy has estimated can profitably be spent on these two ships this year, and it will be the first money expended on them. They will be the children of this Congress, if I may use that expression in regard to ships. We are providing their first sustenance, and are going forward building them.

In addition to these two ships we have stretched the limit of liberality by providing for four more of these most expensive ships ever authorized by the Government.

The table from which I have taken the foregoing figures is as follows:

Increase of the Navy.

Date of act and object of appropriation.	Amount authorized.	Amount appropriated.
Under act of Mar. 3, 1885:
Total under this act	$2,995,000	$1,895,000

I brought into this House, under the instructions of my committee, in 1890, a bill carrying only three of these ships, at a time, Mr. Chairman, when we had probably $100,000,000 surplus of revenue in this country, and when our system of providing income for this Government was rolling up funds in the Treasury vaults to an extent that the surplus in the Treasury was made the slogan and war cry of our political opponents from one end of this country to the other. Then, when the committee recommended the construction of three of these ships, the present Secretary of the Navy, then the senior Democratic member on the Committee on Naval Affairs, took the floor and opposed the construction of more than two; and he did it squarely on the ground that we ought not to go too fast. He took the ground then that he did not think we ought to have many of these ships, and he said in that speech, which I have in my desk, that he thought five or six would be enough. We have six under construction to-day; and he thought it extravagant, that we were going too far, in providing for the construction of three of these ships in one bill and that we ought to take advantage of the improvements that were likely to be made and spread this expenditure over a long period.

I want to advert to a statement made by my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, which I have no doubt he made in good faith, and in which I have no idea he intended to create a misapprehension; but he did. He has given this House an impression—and I state that upon statements that have come to me from gentlemen around me—that I, the chairman of the committee, am so inconsistent that whereas I advocated provision for 10 battle ships in the Forty-ninth Congress, to-day I am only willing to give 4. The gentleman tells me he did not use the word "battle ships."

Mr. HANLY. I said "war ships."

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, if the gentleman said "war ships," the impression made was the same.

Mr. HANLY. I say "war ships" yet.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman proposed unquestionably, if he proposed anything, to convict me in some way of an inconsistency; and he has utterly failed to do so. In the Forty-seventh Congress, on the 14th day of February, when the naval appropriation bill was before the House—and mark you in the year 1887, at the time when money was fairly leaking from the vaults of the Treasury, they were so full—I made a motion on this floor that we provide for 10—what? For 10 protected cruisers. Now, what is a protected cruiser?

Mr. HANLY. War ships.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman seems to think that "war ship" is a distinctive term, and that it is just as impressive if he accuses me of favoring the construction of a torpedo boat as if he accuses me of favoring the construction of a battle ship. But if the gentleman had read the motion carefully he would have seen just what it meant.

Mr. HANLY. I have read it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then why did not the gentleman say so?

Mr. HANLY. I have said so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That motion proposed to provide for 10 protected cruisers, specified the size of the vessels, allowed ample time for their construction, and provided that the expenditure should be spread over a sufficient period. The aggregate cost of those cruisers, exclusive of armament, was to be $15,000,000, "which sum is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; to be available during five years from March 4, 1887." So this immense mountain of extravagance which I was accused of having advocated, so far as the House understood the charge, turns out to be a motion to provide for 10 protected cruisers, to cost $15,000,000, and to be paid for in five years, involving an expenditure of about $3,000,000 a year.

Mr. HANLY. Exclusive of armament.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Exclusive of armament. That, Mr. Chairman, was my extravagant proposition made in 1887. Now, I do not know that it would have any great effect upon the judgment of the House as to the merits of this bill if I had been convicted of absolute inconsistency; but I want to say to my young friend that I stand to-day not only in as liberal an attitude as I then occupied, but I go beyond it, for I have not limited myself in this bill to asking this House to provide for an expenditure of $3,000,000 a year for the next five years for the construction of a few cruisers. I stand here now recommending a provision for the building of four first-class battle ships that are to cost in the aggregate, exclusive of their armament, $3,750,000 each, and that, on the basis of the latest bidding, will make them cost, when completed and armed, between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000 apiece, if not more than that. Instead of the small appropriation, the small annual expenditure, that was proposed by me in 1887 for those cruisers, the bill now under consideration authorizes ships that will cost in the aggregate nearly $2,000,000 more than the aggregate cost of those cruisers. That motion of mine involved an ultimate expenditure of $15,000,000. This bill as it stands here to-day, with the authorization of four battle ships, carries an authorization of an expenditure of $16,675,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. Exclusive of armament.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Exclusive of armament, and the armament costs almost as much as the ship. Now, if we add to that the appropriations that we make in this bill, and the real sponsorship that is here assumed for inaugurating the construction of the two ships that have been contracted for at Newport News, it increases the authorization of expenditure in this bill by $4,000,000 apiece for these vessels, which makes an aggregate authorization of expenditure amounting to about $20,000,000.

We have not followed the example of previous committees in putting in the tonnage and not making appropriation. I say to the Committee of the Whole that this bill carries in the appropriations recommended every dollar that the Department has estimated can be profitably expended during the current fiscal year, and, as my friend well knows, in addition to that we are carrying in this bill a large amount of deficiencies brought over from the last appropriation for various purposes of maintaining the naval establishment. One item in this bill of $350,000 is a deficiency arising from an inadequate appropriation for keeping in repair the ships that we have already in commission. We have granted it and made it immediately available for use this year, and we have added that deficiency to the full amount appropriated last year for that purpose, so that we ask the House to appropriate for the coming year $1,250,000 to keep our ships in repair, as against $900,000 carried in the last bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have made it tolerably plain to the House that this is by no means a mean or an ungenerous appropriation. It is an extraordinary and, in view of the condition of our finances to-day, it is an extravagant provision for the public safety. I want to say to the gentlemen of this Committee of the Whole, every one of whom bears to some constituency and to the country at large the same responsibility that rests upon me—although perhaps for the moment, in regard to a particular measure, I may, and I hope I do, as I ought to, feel a special responsibility because the House has honored me with a special trust—I want to say to all of you gentlemen that it is your duty as well as mine to consider the propriety, to consider the expediency, to look like statesmen and public servants at the appropriations and the various provisions made by this Congress.

We are pledging the people of the United States to large expenditures. The building up of a new navy has cost large sums of money. The expenditure has not been extravagant. It has shown splendid fruits. I ask this House to repose in me in these few closing remarks just such confidence as it may see fit to do, when I say that with a long experience in connection with shipbuilding and with a comparatively long experience in service on the Naval Committee—notwithstanding the statements which have been made here with regard to the facility with which we can supply these vessels with armor and guns—I say to you we have had these same assurances in the past. While I accord the highest credit and praise to these great steel-producing plants for overcoming the difficulties under which they have labored and for getting these works forwarded as they have, I do not believe that providing in this bill for six battle ships additional would give us the last of those ships one month earlier than if we appropriate for four now and follow that action up hereafter with a provision for other vessels.

I know that this is not simply a question of setting those works in operation on the 1st day of January and running them at full capacity through the year. I know practically that for a large portion of this armor they have got to wait until the ship reaches a certain stage of her completion in order that accurate measurements may be taken from the completed hull before they can begin to finish up the armor for those vessels. Therefore, for every ship additional that we authorize we crowd additional work into a limited period.

It does not answer this argument to come in here and show that a certain output of necessary material may be relied upon on an average, working all the time. We must take actual experience; and if I had time I would show, as I shall perhaps take the liberty of showing more fully in my extended remarks, that delays have continued up to last year, and that it is only within a very short time that the battle ships which I had the honor to report to this House in 1890—six years ago—have received the last of their armor.

That has been answered by the statement, "We have gotten over all the difficulties, and now we can do an unlimited amount of work." I do not think that is so. I think there are yet limitations, and that if we provide, as we shall if this bill is passed as printed, for beginning—mark you, beginning—after this date the construction of six of these great battle ships, which can not be put under contract and started before January, we are not only entering upon the largest amount of ship construction in the history of this Government, but we are taxing our facilities to a very great extent.

In regard to the type, I have never encouraged the argument that we should not build ships or guns to-day because some better ones may be built to-morrow. Following that argument, we would never build any. I have heretofore stated in this House, and I repeat to-day, that I believe the general type and character of the battle ship which is designed by the American Government to-day is not only by all odds the best, the most powerful in any navy in the world, but I believe that the type is substantially fixed for some time to come. I can not guarantee that, however, in this age of discovery. In view of the discoveries and inventions of the last few years—in view of some of the marvels of the last few months—he would be a bold man who would dare to say there will be no great change within an early period. But I am satisfied that we are justified in coming forward now and adding to our naval force upon an approved type that is believed to be to-day substantially on the right line for some time to come. But it is not true, any more than it has been in the past, that we can not improve even from month to month.

The Iowa is claimed to be an improvement upon the Indiana. The battle ships that are to-day under contract at Newport News are claimed to be superior in important respects to the Indiana and the Iowa. The Indiana, the Massachusetts, and the Oregon, concerning which I say freely that I believe they are the finest completed ships in the world, were experimental ships with us. They were the first battle ships that we had ever tried to design; and they reflect eternal honor upon their designers. It was a marvel for us to be able to step into this untrodden field and in the first three great fighting ships that we put afloat show that we could not only build ships here of a character almost as good as those constructed in the great shipbuilding establishments of Europe, where they have been engaged for generations in that work, but that we had actually built ships that are conceded by British naval architects, by experts from Japan, and by other maritime powers to be the most powerful vessels in the world.

But nevertheless, as I have said, the Iowa was an improvement, and to-day the Indiana is lying somewhere inside the points of Port Royal waiting for some extraordinary rise of the tide or some interposition of Providence to enable her to get into a dry dock, because she draws too much water for that dry dock, or because the harbor has not as much water as it ought to have. In view of that fact, the Department, in designing the two ships now under construction at Newport News, has modified, wisely and beneficially, as I believe, the design——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask a few minutes additional.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I ask that the gentleman from Maine be allowed so much additional time as he may desire to finish his remarks.

Mr. HANLY. I hope that will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am very grateful to the committee for its courtesy and certainly will not abuse the privilege accorded to me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like him to give the committee information, that he can give, in regard to the facilities the Government possesses for docking the great war ships.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will do so with pleasure if the House desires the information.

But right here let me say, first, that the modification of the models of these ships, by which less draft is secured, is, in my judgment, a very great and marked improvement. But the modifications which have been made afford no substantial criticism of the work of the designers of the first three battle ships constructed, all of which can enter a large number of our harbors, and for all of which there will be adequate docking facilities during the present year at certain points.

But the weights of the great battle ships are an enormous factor in calculation; and in the evolution of these great engines of war, from the incipient plans until they are finally assembled, we have the best result of the study, the experience, and the knowledge of naval construction, which has resulted in building larger ships than were at first contemplated. While their drafts, I will say, are marvelously in accord with the calculations of the designers—indeed, I may say, it is one of the most marvelous things in naval architecture, the accuracy with which these calculations are made—yet it was deemed advisable to have these vessels of less draft if possible, without impairing their usefulness in other ways, and so these two ships last contracted for have been given more floor space—more beam—so that they have less draft, and will be able to enter ports that the other vessels could not enter. Another reason why there have been changes, not of a typical or fundamental character, not in contravention of the desirability of having built the former ships of the Navy, but most desirable in the way of modification and improvements, is that we have in this regard availed ourselves and naval construction has availed itself of the ingenuity—the marked ingenuity and skill—of the American people. For instance, if we were to sit down to-day and determine to build 40 great battle ships in a single year, believing that there would be no improvements hereafter, we would be false to our trust in the American people's skill and ingenuity and commit a very serious blunder. These improvements will come from time to time.

I believe by distributing the construction of the vessels through a considerable length of time we will obtain better results, that we will have the advantage of improvements and discoveries that develop from time to time, and that it is much better for all concerned, instead of creating workshops to an extent almost sure to involve to some degree the slighting of the work and the forced preparation of material as well as the hasty assembling of the parts, to extend the construction over a reasonable length of time.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to know the truth regarding the Texas and one other vessel, if the gentleman from Maine is prepared to answer. If he does not deem it desirable to do so, I hope he will not regard the inquiry.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, the gentleman has asked a question with regard to the Texas. I will answer as best I can. The Texas is a second-class battle ship, and while I may have an impression in regard to it, yet I have not the absolute data which would enable me to discuss her condition in a satisfactory manner to myself. I will simply state to the House that some years ago plans were advertised for and a premium offered for the plans, and one set was presented and accepted from a firm of English constructors for a "second-class battle ship"—I think we call such ships now. The plans were accepted and the ship was put under construction. At the same time the Bureau of Construction and Machinery in the Navy Department prepared plans for a somewhat similar vessel. The Secretary of the Navy placed the vessel that subsequently became the Texas under construction at Norfolk, and the vessel that became the Maine, from designs furnished by the Navy Department itself, at New York, and the construction went forward with various degrees of criticism until they were both put into commission within the past year. I am justified in saying (while beyond the compliment which the Secretary of the Navy [Mr. Whitney] kindly paid to my State in giving her this name I am not personally interested in the ship) that she is believed to be a fine vessel and reflects great credit on the Bureau of Construction and Steam Engineering as well as the Ordnance Bureau. Officers who are acquainted with the ship and who have served on her speak very highly of her. The Texas, when put into commission and put into the dry dock in New York displayed a certain degree of weakness about some portion of the construction which could be discussed better by a naval constructor than myself. There have been various explanations of it and various views expressed in regard to it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If my friend will allow an interruption, I hope he will call attention to the fact that this ship was built from plans furnished by an English concern.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is true. Perhaps I did not bring that out clearly enough, although I stated that the plans were purchased from England. Among the plans that were put in competition came this plan from this English concern. It was accepted by the Secretary as the best plan, and was paid for. I ought to say that our Bureau of Construction in the Navy Department condemned the plans, if I remember, stating that they were defective in some fundamental particulars; that the vessel had not flotation enough, and that she would not carry the armament, etc., which it was believed by the Department she ought to carry.

There were various criticisms about her construction. I do not want to go into details about them; it is too small a matter. There was a widespread impression that, in order to meet the criticisms of the Bureau, she had not sufficient flotation, that those in charge of her construction lightened her material too much in order to help her float, and when she was put in dry dock in New York and took her bearings on the floor of the dry dock her framework, or scantling as they call it in naval nomenclature, was not heavy enough to hold up the side superstructure, and it crumbled. When she was in the water the water bearings held her up all right. Now she has been sent to Norfolk to be repaired, to be strengthened. I understand that the constructor who had charge of her building claims that she can be so repaired as to be an effective ship.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman who constructed her was the gentleman who docked her?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yes, as my friend says, the gentleman who constructed her was the same gentleman who superintended her docking when she met with this mishap. Now, the whole question of the Texas is likely to be examined into hereafter, and therefore I will not say anything more than that she did not prove entirely successful. She is now in the dry dock for repairs at Norfolk, and the degree of success which may attend the attempt to repair her and make her a first-class ship has not been fully disclosed.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asked me to make a statement about the dry docks. I will endeavor to do so briefly and succinctly. Of course you will all understand that the old stone dry docks of the old Navy are not at all available for any of our larger new ships. These modern vessels are enormously longer and larger than the largest of our old ships. We began some years ago the construction of modern and, as we believed at that time, as the debates will disclose, extraordinarily large timber dry docks. We built one in New York. I should like to have my friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] follow me, and if I omit any of these facts, I ask him to prompt me.

We built a new timber dry dock in New York that was at the time believed to be an enormous structure. I thought it was. We authorized one to be built at League Island, and we authorized one to be built at Norfolk. All of them were immensely larger than the old wooden docks at those places. They have been completed. They are fine docks. They accommodate all the ships in the Navy except nine. They were amply large for the vessels we were then constructing, but in the evolution of our Navy, when we came to build the great cruiser New York, and followed that up with these enormous battle ships, we built our ships too big for their houses, and the dry docks were too small. We then authorized a new timber dry dock, a larger one, at New York. There was a great deal of difficulty in the construction. The contractor failed, and one difficulty followed another. Finally the contract was broken, a new contract was made, and I understand that dock will be opened during the coming summer for the reception of ships. It is amply large, and with ample draft, as I am advised, to dock any of our cruisers or any of our battle ships.

The dock at League Island is in the same category as the others. It is large enough for all of our ships except those very largest ones.

Some years ago we authorized a dry dock to be built at Port Royal, a timber dock. It was believed that that dry dock, which was only opened this spring, was large enough and deep enough for our largest ships. I never had a suspicion but that it was. It was designed, I think, to have 26 feet of water over the sill. The Indiana was sent down there to be docked because the large dock in New York was not completed and the other docks were too small. She is there to-day. They have not yet had water enough to get her into that dock. I think that 24 feet and a few inches is the greatest depth of water they have had over the sill up to this time, and I understand—although I have no official information—that the ship is waiting for a higher course of tides.

Mr. TERRY. Speaking of the size of these ships, I will ask the gentleman if there are any of the ports south of Hampton Roads that these large battle ships can enter?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will say to the gentleman that if he will give me the depth of water over their bars, I will tell him in a minute. I am more familiar with the draft of the ships than I am with the depth of the water in those harbors.

Mr. TERRY. The draft of the ships is 25 feet or more, is it not?

Mr. BOUTELLE. No, sir; these contracts for ships to be built at Newport News provides for 23 feet 6 inches.

Mr. TERRY. There are very few Southern ports that they could enter.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My impression was that they could enter all.

Mr. TERRY. I am not sure of it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. They can enter Mobile. It is confidently claimed by my friend from New Orleans that the Indiana or any of that class of vessels can enter the mouth of the Mississippi. They can certainly get into Mobile Bay, and I think they can get into Pensacola.

Mr. TERRY. I will state to the gentleman from Maine that I have been informed that the draft of these battle ships is over 25 feet, and that with that draft they can not enter the Southern ports. I have been further informed that the time for which they carry coal is very short. Will the gentleman state for how many days they carry coal?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I can not tell the gentleman offhand. I can do so readily by referring to the report. They have ample coal capacity for all the purposes for which they are required—to cruise along our coast from Nova Scotia to the Gulf, and even to cross the ocean.

Mr. TERRY. I would like the gentleman to ascertain and put it in the RECORD.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will do that with great pleasure. So far as their entering the ports is concerned, I have understood that they will have no difficulty in entering the principal ports of the South. But these ships can not be built sufficiently powerful on a light draft.

Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina. I would like the gentleman to yield to me two minutes to enable me to make a statement in regard to the Port Royal dock.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina. I regret very much that the condition of my voice is such as to make it almost impossible for me to be heard. On account of the statements that have been made about the dock at Port Royal, I beg to say that it is altogether a mistake that under ordinary conditions that dock will not be suitable for docking the great battle ships. It was built for that express purpose, and is to-day the only dock in the country that can receive the Indiana. I went there myself on a recent occasion when it was supposed she was to be docked, and it was a most grievous disappointment to all concerned that, on account of the peculiar conditions prevailing at that time, she could not enter the dock. That is, it was not considered safe that she should be docked, considering the fact that she was the first battle ship to be docked in this country and the first large ship to be put into that dock. The Amphitrite had tested the dock; but she was so small in comparison with the dock that she had to be put in twice for the purpose of covering its full length. The peculiar condition of things that made it unsafe to dock the Indiana was a succession of westerly winds ending in a northwesterly gale, the same which had overtaken the Indiana off Hatteras on her trip to Port Royal. These westerly winds had driven the water out of the rivers and caused very low tides.

That condition, as is well known, existed also at New York and on the coast of New Jersey, and also in this city, where it is said the tide fell 7 feet lower than usual. Day before yesterday I saw it mentioned in the Baltimore Sun that, in consequence of the low tides prevailing, caused by these westerly winds, ships had experienced great trouble in getting away from the wharves at Norfolk. But there will be no difficulty whatever in docking that ship under ordinary conditions. The depth of water in the dock, I was assured by the commander of the station, Captain Rockwell, was frequently 27 feet; and I am certain that within a day or two, if not to-day, news will be received that the Indiana has been safely docked. There need not be any apprehension, I assure gentlemen, that under ordinary conditions difficulty will be experienced in docking any battle ship at Port Royal.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of my friend from South Carolina to the fact that he made a misstatement, and that was that the Port Royal dock is the only dock that will take in these big battle ships. There is a dock at Port Orchard, on Puget Sound, ready for use that will take any of them.

Mr. FOOTE. That will be done in a few months.

Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina. But it is not completed yet.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to prolong the debate any further. I will close, as I began, by saying we have here the most generous, the most liberal, and if I were not its sponsor I would say the most extravagant, naval bill that has been presented since we began the new Navy. In 1890, when the first battle ships were authorized, the present Secretary objected that we were going too fast by authorizing three. He said we had been spending annually on an average $6,000,000—with plant, about $7,000,000—for building purposes. We have reached that, and the average has been raised. By the annual provisions for new shipping, reached largely by the large appropriation of the Fifty-first Congress and by the appropriation of this bill, we reach an average of $7,783,891 in actual provisions for work in building up the new Navy, and I confidently ask gentlemen of the committee and of the House to stand by the committee in the work that it has so faithfully and painstakingly done, and I believe you will do so. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I omitted to say, what I assume is understood, that I hope this amendment will be voted down, and I express that hope in the firm conviction that it is not only in the best interests of the Government, but of the future building up of the American Navy.

The question being taken, the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HANLY. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 134.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert in line 13, page 50, after "vided," the following:

"That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President of the United States that one or more said vessels and their machinery can be constructed at any of the navy-yards of the Government within the amount appropriated, he may authorize and order the same to be built at such yards as he may designate."

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word about that amendment. The object of it is this: It is a well-known fact that in several of our navy-yards the Government has placed very extensive plants. Taking, for instance, the navy-yard located in Brooklyn and speaking for that, knowing it as well as I do, I may say that there is there a very complete plant for the building of ships. Machinery has been purchased and placed in the navy-yard by the Government which will perform the backing, stamping, and bending of plates as well as it can be done in any shop in this country.

Now, in my judgment it is absolutely necessary for the protection of the country in this respect that these expensive plants shall be maintained and kept in order, for this reason: If in the event of war any of our ships should be damaged, it would of course be necessary that the Government should have at all times depots for their repair. I take it that in the event of war the main naval battles would be fought in or around the harbor of New York. Of course, other battles might be fought off Boston or off Philadelphia, but suppose a battle to be fought off the harbor of New York, if in the meantime the plant in the navy-yard there had been allowed to rot and go to pieces from nonuse, it would be necessary to send any of our vessels that got damaged in the conflict to some other place for repairs.

Now, except the navy-yard at Portsmouth, where also the plant should be kept in use, there is no other place to which to send a damaged vessel but the private shipyards on the Delaware. But if she were badly injured she might not be able to make her way to those yards, or, even if the damage was not serious enough to prevent her from going that distance, it might happen that the enemy's squadron would blockade the entrance to the Delaware River and thus prevent her from reaching those private yards. It does not matter whether the Government shall order some of these vessels or torpedo boats to be built at these several yards, the building of them will have this effect: It will keep the machinery in the navy-yards in condition, so that it can be used when it is needed, and it will keep in each yard a force of men who by their skill and experience will be always able to do the work of repair in an emergency. On the other hand, the result of a discontinuance of work in the yards has been that men have left the Government employ and gone into the employ of private concerns, so that it will be necessary to reestablish the force when it is required unless by a wise policy we keep it up all the time.

It may be said that the ships can not be built as cheaply in the Government yards as they can be built by contractors. Upon that point I take issue; but my amendment is so worded that that objection can not have any force. I have carefully prepared the amendment, and gentlemen will observe that it provides that the President shall order one or more of these vessels to be built in the various yards only when he shall be convinced that they can be built there within the appropriation. At the Brooklyn yard recently were built two ships——

On motion of Mr. ODELL, the time of Mr. FISCHER was extended five minutes.

Mr. FISCHER. I am obliged to the committee. At the Brooklyn yard were built two ships, the Maine and the Cincinnati. I have heard it said that the Cincinnati cost so much that it was impossible to convince anyone thereafter that the navy-yards could build ships within the appropriation. But I ask gentlemen whether they know the fact that the great cost in the construction of the Cincinnati occurred through a fire in the machine shop in the Brooklyn yard, which destroyed the machinery——

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the gentleman will allow me, the increase was so great as to make the cost nearly double.

Mr. FISCHER. Oh, no; it was not double. The increase of cost was that which resulted from the fire——

Mr. CUMMINGS. The limit was $1,100,000, and the cost was $2,020,000.

Mr. FISCHER. Well, I will not dispute the gentleman's limit. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. In other words, you raise the limit. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISCHER. No; I can not afford to do that. This, like "the ships that pass in the night," of which the gentleman from California spoke, is dismissed. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the additional cost in that case resulted from the destruction of machinery in the machine shop in the navy-yard. But for that the vessel would have been built within the appropriation. Now, both these ships, the Cincinnati and the Maine, have turned out to be excellent vessels in their class.

Mr. CUMMINGS. May I call the gentleman's attention to the cost of the Maine? Her limit was $2,500,000, and her cost was $3,963,000.

Mr. FISCHER. That may be possible; but I imagine from what I know that some of these things occurred through a change of plan.

Mr. Chairman, I want to add (and I am reminded of this by a gentleman near me) that while the Maine was built at a cost exceeding the amount appropriated, I wish gentlemen to remember that the reason the Maine was ordered to be built at a navy-yard was that no contractor would take her at the figure fixed in the appropriation; nobody would undertake to build her so cheaply. And in addition her plans were altered. So that there is nothing in those figures to prove that the Government could have had that vessel built for less.

Now I ask in the interest of the Government service that the personnel may be kept up at these navy-yards; that these yards shall be kept in good order and not allowed to rot. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee [Mr. BOUTELLE] whether we were correct in understanding him to state that these vessels could be built for about a million dollars less than the maximum sum named in the provision for giving out their construction by contract? If that is the case, then this amendment will authorize the building of one or more of these battle ships in a navy-yard, notwithstanding the cost might be a million dollars more than it would be if the construction were let out by contract.

Mr. FISCHER. I wish to say to the gentleman from Maine that such is not the intent of my amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the gentleman should modify the language of the proposition.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let me say a word for the information of the House. The Kentucky and the Kearsarge were authorized to cost $4,000,000 apiece, but they are now under contract for $2,255,000 each.

Mr. FISCHER. I do not think that any language used in my amendment would authorize the construction which gentlemen seem disposed to put upon it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that the gentleman modify the language of his amendment.

Mr. FISCHER. I will do so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from New York will plainly see that if we put in this bill an amendment that the construction of these vessels shall not be submitted to contract, the Government will be deprived of the benefit which the provision of the bill was designed to give it, because under the amendment these vessels may cost, if the navy-yards should see fit to make them cost, the full amount of the maximum named.

Mr. FISCHER. The amendment simply provides for constructing at some of our navy-yards "one or more" of these vessels. But I modify the amendment by striking out "shall" and inserting "may."

Mr. DINGLEY. How does that obviate the difficulty?

Mr. FISCHER. The amendment will then simply provide that the President "may" order one or more of these vessels to be constructed at a navy-yard.

Mr. MILNES. I call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that while this bill fixes $3,750,000 as the maximum cost of each of these vessels, it is a fact that similar vessels now under contract are costing us only a little over $2,000,000 apiece.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Let me state this matter in brief. This bill fixes the extreme limit of cost at $3,750,000; but we do not expect that these vessels will cost anything like that. If, however, the amendment should be adopted, the vessels may be built at our navy-yards, and every dollar of that sum may be spent. The amendment ought not to be adopted.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. FISCHER was rejected.

Mr. HILBORN. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "one," the last word in the last line of page 49, and insert in lieu thereof the word "five"; so that the clause will read, "and five of said torpedo boats shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean."

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Chairman, in this bill we have provided for the building of 15 torpedo boats, but only one of these is to be built on the Pacific Coast. The effect of my amendment is to allow five of them to be built there. These torpedo boats are for use on the Pacific Ocean as well as on this side, and it seems to me that those which are to be used on the Pacific ought to be constructed on that coast. These are not seagoing vessels. If those designed for service on the Pacific are to be built on the Atlantic Coast, how are they to be transferred to the Pacific? There is no way of getting them there, and if it were practicable to take them round Cape Horn the additional expense thus caused would exceed the added cost of building them on the Pacific Coast. It seems to me that every consideration of economy demands that those torpedo boats which are to be used on the Pacific should be constructed on the Pacific Coast. I ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. BOUTELLE] to accept this amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. "The chairman of the committee" would be very glad to accept any amendment as a matter of courtesy to a colleague on the committee or as a matter of kindness to any section of the country if public duty would allow it.

This matter was fully considered by the committee. The difference of cost that would result from the building of four torpedo boats, instead of one, on the Pacific Coast would be comparatively slight. Yet I may be allowed to say that we were, and intended to be, very liberal and generous toward our friends on the Pacific Coast. We have reported in the bill a provision allowing one of these battle ships to be constructed on the Pacific Coast, even though the bid for its construction there should be larger than some others, provided it be kept within a reasonable limit; and indeed all of these battle ships may be built there if the bids from that region should be low enough. But, taking into consideration the probabilty of the increased expenditure for getting material for the construction, we granted in the bill that one of these battle ships shall go there, unless the bid is beyond that which is regarded as fair and reasonable.

So far as the torpedo boats are concerned, I will be perfectly frank with the committee and with the gentleman from California, by saying that these are provided for at the earnest request and recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy; and the committee has believed it advisable to leave them entirely and absolutely to his discretion. You know, the committee know, and the country knows—it is public property now, for it is contained in a printed pamphlet in this House—that the Secretary has already contracted with the Herreshoffs for the construction of some of the boats previously authorized, because the Department are satisfied from the exhibits made to them on the part of these builders that they will provide a very superior type of vessel in speed and other qualities, and desiring to avail ourselves of the experience of these men, who are believed to be capable of building the quickest and best vessels of this type, it was deemed advisable to leave the matter entirely in the discretion of the Secretary. It is believed that they will be able to furnish the fastest boat yet furnished by any of the contractors; and the appropriation for this purpose was made in bulk, "five torpedo boats, to cost $875,000 in all," so as to enable the Secretary of the Navy to vary his contract if he deems it desirable in regard to two or three of them, expending a little more money on these if necessary to produce a superior vessel, and giving a higher price of course to the contractors for the same.

The provision of the bill is that one of the vessels and one torpedo boat shall be built (and it follows former bills in this regard)—for the purpose of preventing any possible idea of sectionalism—that one of each of these shall be built on the Pacific Coast, one torpedo boat on the Mississippi River, and one on the Gulf of Mexico, and so on; but if we adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California none of these could be built on the Atlantic Coast at all, and it would absolutely defeat the desire of the Department to continue under a special contract the construction by the same people in this case and enable them to build some of these vessels, putting into the construction the experience that they have gained in this regard, and which is believed by the Department to be so valuable.

Mr. HILBORN. How could we transport them to the Pacific Coast even if they were built at the Herreshoffs?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOW. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, after the word "dollars," in line 10, page 49 of the bill, by inserting "45 first-class torpedo boats of from 100 to 125 tons displacement, to have a maximum speed of not less than 24 knots, and to cost not more than an average of $175,000 each."

Mr. LOW. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is just as important, just as urgent, and just as necessary to meet the wants of our Navy as any provisions outlined in the original bill, and for several reasons—

First. Because torpedo boats are needed not only to assist in protecting our harbors, but to broaden the scope of effective work in connection with our fleets.

Second. This amendment means to provide an opportunity for young naval officers to learn the practical science of commanding.

This has been, and is to-day, a problem of great import. Our naval officers in the middle and lower grades are suffering for the want of an opportunity to command, and the country will be the loser unless it provides for the bright, ambitious, and young officers the opportunity to command, to be captain of his own war vessel, be she ever so small.

Legislation does not nor can not make a commander, except in rank and pay. A commander, in the broadest sense of the title and meaning, can only be made by actual experience in commanding his own vessel, and this must be obtained while the officer is in the early prime of life, for at that period his ambition stimulates him to seek proficiency, power, prominence, and rank. These 50 torpedo boats mean 50 commands for officers not above the grade of lieutenant.

The officers of these boats have to be changed so frequently, that during a year fully 200 officers will have an opportunity to familiarize themselves with a captain's duty.

If these 50 vessels can be the means of developing one Paul Jones or a Farragut it will be worth the cost of the entire fleet asked for in my amendment.

Mr. STEELE. What would be the necessity for launching out into this expenditure if there were no officers capable of commanding them?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope we will vote without further delay.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. LOW, it was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to amend by inserting "four," in line 24, on page 49; so that it will read:

And four of said torpedo boats shall be built on or near the coast of the Pacific Ocean.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of line 24, on page 49, strike out the word "one" and insert the word "four."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to state in that connection that it is well known that the shipbuilding plants located on the Pacific Coast are very large and fine ones. On Puget Sound we are already building one of the best torpedo boats, it is said, that has been constructed, and we are also building in the plant there a tug for the use of the Government. Now, these people are ambitious, and I think, inasmuch as 15 of these vessels are to be constructed, that at least 4 of them should be constructed on the Pacific Coast under the restrictions contained in this bill. I believe it to be fair to the building up of that industry and the interest that should be manifested in that industry on that coast. I ask the House to vote for this amendment, because I believe it to be in the interest of the country, in the interests of the Navy, and in the interest of economy. No means is provided at the present time for the transportation of these torpedo boats from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and in case of war there will be need for these vessels in that ocean. I believe that the building up of these plants ought to be encouraged in this way, and that the amendment is entirely fair, in the interest of the country, and in the interest of the service.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE, on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of California) there were—ayes 50, noes 76.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding after the word "act," on page 50, line 15, the following: "Provided further, That no draftsman, designer, copyist, or other person shall hereafter be employed in the preparation of the plans or specifications for new vessels of the Navy who is not a citizen of the United States."

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is the object of that amendment?

Mr. TATE. The object of the amendment is that our designs may be kept private.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I make the point of order that that changes existing law.

Mr. TATE. I think I have the floor.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have no objection to the gentleman making his explanation. I do not want to lose my point of order.

Mr. TATE. I think the gentleman has already lost it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. TATE. The only purpose of the amendment is that our designs and drawings shall be kept private, shall not be known to any foreigner; that we shall not employ foreigners to make them, but shall trust our own citizens to make them. That is the sole purpose of the amendment. It explains itself. I do not care to make a speech on the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment will not be agreed to. We must trust to the officers of the Navy Department to properly guard the secrets of our designs. The mere exclusion of some draftsman or colorist who may be a skillful man will not necessarily keep our secrets. I know nothing about the fact whether any foreign people are employed there or not. I think that an amendment like this would have excluded this Government from the benefit of the genius of Ericsson, who designed the Monitor. I am compelled to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MERCER. I desire to submit an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 50, in line 15, after the word "act," add "Provided, That one of the battle ships shall bear the name Nebraska."

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, the State of Nebraska is midway between the great oceans and not very near the Great Lakes or the Gulf of Mexico, but we take an interest in the American Navy and believe it should be second to none. Of course I am well aware that year after year Congress appropriates large sums of money for the dredging and improvement of various harbors and thereby makes them accessible to ships of war as well as of peace, and we are certainly justified in building battle ships to protect the cities situated on harbors which by our own action we have made subject to the shot and shell of foreign gunboats.

Nebraska is fortunate in this respect; in fact, Omaha and the other cities along the Missouri River are amply fortified.

We have the best line of sand bars in that stream that were ever placed anywhere by the Creator of the universe. [Laughter.] These sand bars are never conquered and they would smile at any fleet so foolhardy as to attack them. We have no fear of the combined navies of the world as long as these sand bars give us the protection we now enjoy; but, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, we in Nebraska take an interest in the Navy, and since we are prevented from harboring battle ships, you should not deprive us of the pleasure and privilege of having one of them bear the name "Nebraska." Indiana, Iowa, and Kentucky have been thus remembered, and Nebraska vies with them in seacoast mileage. [Laughter.] It is not our fault that we have neither ocean, lake, nor gulf. We are ready to accept either, but as a rule Nebraskans never take water [laughter], although under the trials and tribulations imposed upon us by this Administration we are willing to take most anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, good-natured as he is, will favor this amendment of mine. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have to say to my friend that the naming of these ships is not in the province of the committee.

Mr. MERCER. I wanted the Committee of the Whole to name them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The committee have no authority to name ships.

Mr. MERCER. Give us a trial.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman that no vessel is named Pennsylvania as yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "Nebraska" and insert "Quay, Reed, McKinley, and Allison."

[Great laughter, and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HULICK. I would like to have that voted on separately.

Mr. MERCER. I did not refer to cruisers, Mr. Chairman, I referred to battle ships. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Nebraska" insert "and Pennsylvania."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Pennsylvania. There is a peculiar propriety, if I may coin the expression, in naming a ship Pennsylvania, because we build these ships in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MONEY. And you get all the money.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MERCER. Now help the West!

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MERCER. Division.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. MERCER. I beg pardon.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 87.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Provided," in line 13, page 50, the following: "One of the torpedo boats herein provided for shall be constructed at each of the United States navy-yards having the necessary facilities for such construction."

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy the attention of the committee by any remarks, but will merely send up a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 25, 1896.

SIR: Responding to yours of March 21, asking whether it would be good policy to build some torpedo boats, to be authorized by the present Congress, at navy-yards, I beg to say that in my opinion it is not as a rule desirable to build ships at navy-yards, on account of the greater cost. I would recommend, however, that authority be given to the Department to build at least one torpedo boat at each of the three principal navy-yards. The increased cost would probably be some 10 per cent over the prices at which these vessels can be built by contract, but the building of a boat at each navy-yard will greatly aid in retaining the force of skilled workmen necessary for the repairs of vessels.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. A. HERBERT,
Secretary.

Hon. S. G. HILBORN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I will simply say that we are providing in this bill $1,250,000 for carrying on the work of repairs in the navy-yards, which will have the effect of keeping these skilled workmen. The objection applies even more to the building of torpedo boats than the building of ordinary ships, because these small craft require the very highest technical skill, and we want to give them to contractors whom we can bind by heavy penalties to produce the very best results. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move that the bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman in charge of the bill that when unanimous consent was had this morning for general debate the understanding was that the section pertaining to the increase of the Navy should be considered as read; but there are two sections following that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. These are the appropriations, I will state, under the heads of "Construction," "Machinery," "Armor," and "Equipment."

The remaining sections were read.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the bill and amendments be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7542, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move the previous question, but will withhold it for a moment that the gentleman from Illinois may report some documents that he has.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CANNON. I give notice that I propose to call the bill up for consideration to-morrow.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOUTELLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I thank the House, on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, for its generous action this afternoon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1179) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, relating to appointment of officers in the Army or Navy of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers," etc., approved March 2, 1893.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DRAPER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BURTON of Ohio, for five days, on account of important business.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

On request of Mr. SULZER, a reprint was ordered of the bill (H. R. 3346) to raise additional revenue for the support of the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of cost of securing a channel in Newtown Creek, New York, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6659) providing for the withdrawal of distilled spirits from bonded warehouses by the distiller or owner, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 948); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DINGLEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 494) constituting Stamford, Conn., a subport of entry, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 949); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HARTMAN, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred House bill No. 2555, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 7625) providing for proofs of discovery of mineral or placer mining claims containing petroleum and other mineral oils, accompanied by a report (No. 951); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. ERDMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill (S. 684) granting an increase of pension to Marion McKibben. (Report No. 950.)

The bill (H. R. 3884) for the relief of John T. Brewster. (Report No. 956.)

By Mr. MILES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 1505) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah A. Aspold. (Report No. 953.)

By Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 5670) to increase the pension of Richard S. Phillips. (Report No. 954.)

By Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 3945) granting a pension to Thomas J. Thorp, late private Company K, Third Ohio Volunteer Cavalry. (Report No. 952.)

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 4264) granting a pension to Mary Pelham. (Report No. 955.)

By Mr. BRUMM, from the Committee on Claims:

The bill (S. 281) for the relief of F. M. Vandling. (Report No. 957.)

The bill (S. 1380) for the relief of Hyland C. Kirk and others, assignees of Addison C. Fletcher. (Report No. 958.)

The bill (S. 1180) for the relief of the legal representatives of John Roach, deceased. (Report No. 959.)

By Mr. GRAFF, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 4243) to pay for improving the streets in front of the post-office site in the city of Sacramento, State of California. (Report No. 960.)

By Mr. WOODARD, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 4632) for the relief of Frederick B. Betts, surviving partner of the firm of Betts, Nichols & Co. (Report No. 961.)

By Mr. COLSON, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 6425) for the relief of Clifton R. Anderson. (Report No. 962.)

By Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (S. 2176) granting a pension to Thomas Pollock. (Report No. 963.)

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 1018) to increase the pension of Bennett S. Shaug. (Report No. 964.)

By Mr. MOZLEY, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 4712) granting a pension to Margaret A. Luthy. (Report No. 965.)

ADVERSE REPORT.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2298) legalizing the assessment and levy of taxes on personal property on the various Indian reservations in Oklahoma, and for other purposes, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 947); and the said bill and report were laid on the table.

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WILLIAMS: A bill (H. R. 7616) to grant a township of land to the hospital medical college bureau of vital statistics of the University of Mississippi at Vicksburg, Miss.—To the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. LESTER: A bill (H. R. 7617) to authorize the President to appoint three commissioners of claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7618) authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate certain claims arising under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property," etc.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HERMANN: A bill (H. R. 7619) to provide topographic surveys and mark elevations on the arid lands—to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. REYBURN (by request): A bill (H. R. 7620) authorizing a special election to be held by the citizens of the District of Columbia to determine whether the present municipal government shall continue or whether there shall be established in its place a representative form of government—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MEREDITH: A bill (H. R. 7621) to authorize the Herndon and Aldie Railroad Company to construct a bridge over the Potomac River at or below the Great Falls—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 7622) to grant right of way over the public domain for pipe lines—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. FOWLER: A bill (H. R. 7623) to extend the time of commencement and the completion of the bridge authorized to be constructed in Newark Bay—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7624) for continuing the improvement of Rahway River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BURTON of Ohio: A joint resolution (H. Res. 149) for change of location of light-house provided for on Little Bay de Noquette—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HEATWOLE: A concurrent resolution (House Con. Res. No. 35) to appoint a commission to act with the Comptroller of the Currency and report to Congress—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BARRETT: A resolution (House Res. No. 225) of inquiry regarding the Venezuela affair—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi: A memorial relating to the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in Nashville, Tenn.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: A memorial of the legislature of the State of Mississippi relating to a hospital medical college and bureau of vital statistics of the University of Mississippi—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7554) to pension John Teague; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. AVERY: A bill (H. R. 7626) to remove the charge of desertion against the military record of William H. Collins—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 7627) granting increase of pension to Michael Lochard—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CONNOLLY: A bill (H. R. 7628) to increase the pension of William T. Evans—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. NELSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented the petition of Judge Ira B. Mills, of St. Paul, Minn., chairman of the committee on uniform freight classification, praying for the enactment of legislation providing a national system of uniform classification of freight throughout the United States; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN presented sundry petitions of citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1886, or some similar measure, requiring the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company to adopt rapid transit on its lines, and remonstrating against the extension of the tracks of that company until its existing lines are modernly equipped and operated; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER presented a memorial of Abe Lincoln Council, No. 2, of Leadville, Colo., and a memorial of Council No. 12, of Sterling, Colo., remonstrating against the placing of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the State Board of Trade of Maine, praying for the establishment of a department of commerce and manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HILL presented a petition of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, praying for the establishment of a department of commerce and manufactures; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a new custom-house at the port of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HILL. I present resolutions adopted by the faculty of the school of mines of Columbia University, favoring the passage of the bill to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy, etc. In connection therewith, I wish to read the following letter from the president of the university:

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY, IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK,
President's Room, February 27, 1896.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the pleasure of handing you herewith copy of a preamble and resolutions adopted by the faculty of the School of Mines of Columbia University. I am sure you will agree with me in the desire that this oldest of the universities of the State of New York should not be behindhand in cooperating with the Government in advancing so laudable an object as is aimed at by the bill referred to. It appears to be particularly Columbia's duty to do this, because of its location in the great port of our State and of the United States. If you shall see fit to accompany the presentation of this petition with any remarks favorable to its object, I beg to assure you that I believe Columbia will do everything in its power to make the bill effective in the accomplishment of its purpose should it become a law.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SETH LOW, President.

Hon. DAVID B. HILL,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

I do not know that it is necessary that I should accompany the presentation of the petition by any extended remarks. The letter itself presents the subject admirably.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH presented a petition of sundry citizens of Trenton, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation giving protection to American citizens in Turkey and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. S. M. Swaim and 36 other members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Chatham, N. J., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Jersey, praying for the appointment of an international board of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of John B. Smith and 11 other citizens of Newark, N. J., Union soldiers and sailors who lost a limb in the war of the rebellion, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 354, to adjust the pensions of those who have lost limbs or have been totally disabled in them; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of Ellsworth Council, No. 120, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Silverton, N. J.; of Summit Council, No. 87, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Jersey City, N. J.; of Hightstown Council, No. 70, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Hightstown, N. J.; of Lafayette Council, No. 129, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Jersey City, N. J.; of Fidelity Council, No. 8, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Millville, N. J., and of Belleville Council, No. 163, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Belleville, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. ALLISON presented the memorial of Dr. Philip Slack and 8 other citizens of Hesper, Iowa, and a memorial of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Mount Vernon, Iowa, remonstrating against the introduction of military training in the public schools of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of 44 citizens of Wright County, Iowa; of 44 citizens of College Springs, Iowa; of 31 citizens of Wright County, Iowa; of 17 citizens of College Springs, Iowa; of 44 citizens of Coin, Iowa; of 51 citizens of Clearfield, Iowa, and of 17 citizens of College Springs, Iowa, praying for the adoption of the proposed religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAYMENTS REFUSED BY EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

Mr. PEFFER. Some time ago Senate bill 238 was reported favorably from the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service. It is a bill "to prohibit officers of the Government from refusing to pay moneys appropriated by act of Congress." Since the bill was reported I am informed that in another branch of Congress the same subject is being investigated by the Judiciary Committee of that body; also that the subject which originally inspired the introduction of the bill is now pending in the Court of Claims and will probably be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States for adjudication. I have thought it best to ask that the bill be stricken from the Calendar and in connection therewith to ask that the paper which I hold in my hand and will describe in a moment may be printed as a document for the use of the Senate and such other persons as may need it.

It is an argument of ex-Senator Manderson before Comptroller Bowler, of the Treasury Department, in the cases known as the sugar-bounty cases, in which Mr. Manderson has cited and gone through all of the authorities bearing upon the claims of United States officers to set aside acts of Congress when, in their judgment, the acts are not beneficent. It would save a great deal of trouble when the subject comes before the Senate, as it probably will, and also afford a great deal of satisfaction to lawyers who are interested in this subject, and at the request of a number of members of the profession, I move that the argument of the ex-Senator be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

HISTORY OF SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. ALLEN. I present a brief history of the Santee Sioux Indians of Nebraska and the Flandreau Sioux Indians of South Dakota, which I ask may be printed as a document. It will make a very small document, and it is important in the consideration of matters before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). In the absence of objection, the paper will be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2469) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to quitclaim and release unto Francis Hall and Juriah Hall, and their heirs and assigns, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the east 20 feet front by the full depth of 100 feet of lot 2, in square 493, in the city of Washington, D. C., as laid down on the original plan or plat of said city, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5105) to abolish days of grace on promissory notes, drafts, etc., in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2153) to abolish days of grace on promissory notes, drafts, etc., in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 493) for the erection of a public building at Waterbury, Conn., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2492) authorizing the purchase of a site for a building for the accommodation of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2555) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue leases of certain islands in Alaska for the breeding of foxes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. QUAY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 286) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Oakland, in the State of California, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 335) for the relief of Esther A. Keyser, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GEAR, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2394) to provide for the construction of a public building at Salem, Oreg., reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 154) to provide for the erection of a public building at Indianapolis, Ind., reported it with amendments.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Printing I report a joint resolution which I ask may be considered.

The joint resolution (S. R. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the annual report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form, and to bind it in one volume, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, etc., That paragraph 8, section 73, of the act of January 12, 1896, providing for the public printing and binding, etc., be amended by striking out all of said paragraph after the word "survey," at the end of the first and beginning of the second lines, and substituting in lieu thereof the following words: "Two thousand eight hundred copies in quarto form, bound in one volume, 200 for the Senate, 600 for the House, and 2,000 for distribution by the Coast and Geodetic Survey."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT ON SALMON FISHERIES OF ALASKA.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. TELLER on the 5th instant, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the report of the special agent for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska for the year 1894, 6,000 copies; 1,500 for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

OFFICIAL REPORTER OF DEBATES.

Mr. HALE. I report from the Committee on Printing the resolution which I send to the desk. The resolution should be passed at once, owing to the death of the Official Reporter of the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Theodore F. Shuey is hereby appointed Official Reporter for reporting the proceedings and debates of the Senate until further order of the Senate, subject to all the duties and obligations of the contract made with D. F. Murphy, deceased, late Reporter of the Senate, and to the supervision and control of the Committee on Printing on behalf of the Senate, in all respects therein provided, and to receive payment for such service according to law.

Mr. HILL. Let that go over.

Mr. QUAY. I object to the consideration of the resolution at present. Let it go over.

Mr. HALE. Of course it ought not to be delayed long. I shall call up the resolution to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 2641) for the relief of William Leech; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ELKINS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2656) to provide for the purchase of a site for the Government Printing Office, and the construction of buildings therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations:

Whereas under an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," approved March 3, 1891, there were filed in the Court of Claims ten thousand eight hundred and forty-one (10,841) cases; and

Whereas, as it is shown by the report of the Attorney-General for the year 1895, only nine hundred and forty-four (944) of said cases have been reduced to judgment during a period of nearly five years, and only forty-four (44) in the year ending November 1, 1895, while during the last-named period the Attorney-General has made motions for new trials in about one hundred and fifty (150) of said cases in which judgments had been rendered nearly two years prior to the filing of said motions;

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and investigate the manner in which these Indian depredation cases are being tried, with a view to ascertaining who, if anyone, is responsible for the great and unreasonable delay and expense, both to the Government and the claimants, in the trial thereof, and to report what amendments, if any, to the act of March 3, 1891, or what change in the tribunal before which such cases should be heard, or what other measures are necessary in order to carry out the intention of Congress when it passed said act, and to do speedy and substantial justice between the United States and the Indians on the one hand and the claimants on the other.

UNSURVEYED PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CALL. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire and report such legislation, by bill or otherwise, as may be necessary to prevent the unsurveyed public lands of the United States from being approved and patented without a survey and examination, and report as to their being swamp and overflowed in the meaning of the act of Congress.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the resolution may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Idaho to withdraw his objection for one moment.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well; I withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. CALL. I desire to read a letter from the Assistant Commissioner of Public Lands. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 18, 1896, asking information for the benefit of W. T. Chapman, of Tampa, Fla., in relation to the rights of settlers on unsurveyed lands, and in reply you are advised that a homestead settler on unsurveyed public land not yet open to entry must make entry within three months after the filing of the township plat of survey in the district land office, his settlement being protected for that period only.

The land "near Cape Sable" with regard to which you make inquiry is unsurveyed, and therefore there are no entries upon the same as shown by the records of this office. However, all the unsurveyed land in what would be, if surveyed, T. 61 S., R. 33 E., Florida, within the limits of which Cape Sable appears to be situated, has been selected by the State under act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat., 519).

Very respectfully, E. F. BEST, Assistant Commissioner.

Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

I call the attention of the Committee on Public Lands and the chairman of that committee to the fact that unsurveyed lands in the State of Florida, public lands of the United States, are being patented and approved without any survey and without any examination, dispossessing the settlers upon those lands of their homes.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator from Florida that I have no doubt the Committee on Public Lands will make a very full and thorough investigation, but as I understand the attention of no member of the committee has been called to the resolution, I think it proper that it shall go over until to-morrow, so that we may have time to examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate directing the Public Printer to eliminate from the 10,000 copies of the Report on the Statistics of Agriculture in the United States Census of 1890 the monograph entitled "Report on agriculture by irrigation in the western part of the United States," etc.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 572) for the relief of Jane Duke;

A bill (H. R. 2265) to provide for the reimbursement of the expenses of constructing a sewer upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark.;

A bill (H. R. 7170) to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railroad Company the right to acquire depot grounds at the town of Davis, Tishomingo County, Chickasaw Nation, Ind. T.; and

A bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 1179) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by chapter 46 of the laws of 1884, relating to appointment of officers in the Army or Navy of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. 5828) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers," etc., approved March 2, 1893.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. Before we proceed to a discussion of the provisions in relation to marshals and district attorneys, I desire to correct a mistake on page 40 of the bill in the items for the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department. In line 23 the word "four" was inserted, as in Committee of the Whole, before "clerks" instead of "five." I ask that that amendment be reconsidered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where is that?

Mr. CULLOM. On page 40. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has called my attention to an error as to the amendment that we undertook to make there. It should read "five clerks of class 2; eight clerks of class 1."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the vote by which the amendment in line 23 was agreed to will be reconsidered. The vote is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out "five" and insert "four."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULLOM. In the same line, before the word "clerks," I move to strike out "nine" and insert "eight"; so as to read:

Eight clerks of class 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the clerks will correct the footing there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The correction in the footing will be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought an amendment was made yesterday on page 96. It was intended to be made and I thought it was agreed to, but I see that the RECORD does not show it, and I suppose that the Journal will not show it. On page 96, line 2, in the item for surveyor-general of New Mexico, the word "seven" before "thousand" should be changed to "ten," and in line 3, "nine" before "thousand" should be changed to "twelve"; so as to read:

For surveyor-general of the Territory of New Mexico, $2,000; and for clerks in his office, $10,000; in all, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Missouri has no further amendments, I hope we will proceed with the consideration of the provisions in relation to marshals and district attorneys, upon which I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has the floor.

Mr. VILAS. I understand the motion now is to strike out the entire provision.

Mr. CULLOM. It is.

Mr. VILAS. I wish to make a motion to amend section 6 by striking it out and substituting another, and I suppose that motion will have precedence of the general motion to strike out the entire subject.

Mr. CULLOM. It will.

Mr. VILAS. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I will send up the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 6 as it stands in the bill and insert as a new section:

SEC. 6. That the United States district attorney for each of the judicial districts of the United States, except the southern district of New York, which shall continue under existing law, shall be paid an annual salary of $4,000; and except that in the district of Massachusetts, the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the eastern district of Louisiana, the northern district of California, and the northern district of Illinois he shall be paid an annual salary of $6,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I wish to make an observation in reference to the amendment, and with that I will leave the subject.

This proposition to change the system of fees to a system of salary compensation is one which has long been agitated in Congress and a great deal of labor has been expended upon it. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] for a long time wrought upon this subject with a great deal of efficient labor. Yet I think the difficulty which in the end more than anything else tended to obstruct the acceptance of the view has been the trouble of adjusting the salaries. Each district is striving to claim a high salary, and basing that claim upon the amount of alleged business which has been done in the district in past time. In my opinion the business of the past as indicated by the emoluments which have been received by the several district attorneys of the different districts furnishes no fair basis for the arrangement of the salary. In many cases the business has been worked up by assidnous, ingenious cultivation, and the evils which we are seeking to eradicate would be more or less perpetuated by an effort to adjust the salaries upon the basis of the computations of district attorneys' fees in the past. I think we ought to try the salary system in this country. I believe it will have a tendency, and probably a very effective tendency, to diminish much vexatious litigation instituted in the name of the United States in the way particularly of prosecutions for minor offenses.

But I do not think anybody can expect that we shall adjust the salaries in anything like a fair measure of accordance with the work which is done in the different districts. Indeed, I presume every Senator will recognize the fact that in the same district in different years a vast amount of difference exists in the labor called upon to be exerted by the district attorney. Now and then a case arises in reference to which a district attorney is called upon to expend more valuable professional labor in a single year than he might perhaps for five years before or five years after be required to exert. If we adopt a fixed salary in the several districts we shall have, doubtless, at different times a great variety of compensation without reference to the actual work that is done, but we shall fix upon a system which is the fairest upon the whole, the most just upon the whole, and which will more nearly in the long run meet the necessities of the case.

Besides, I think everybody will recognize that we have strained the salaries to a point too high in the present provisions. We shall have no difficulty in securing sufficient talent and ability to conduct the business of the Government at the rate of salary proposed in the amendment, and we shall do far better, in my judgment, if we have a uniform salary than if we attempt to vary the salary to meet supposed differences in different districts. We never shall so adjust salaries as to make an accurate, strict compensation for the work that is done, measured by a fair rule as between different district attorneys. The same principle which has governed the adjustment of salaries for judges ought to govern the adjustment of salaries for district attorneys and for marshals. There should be uniformity. Let there be uniformity in the salaries. Let the different officers take their chances as they must in respect to the amount of work that will be required to be performed by them. As the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] sitting by my side suggests to me, it will be more or less equalized by the appointment of deputies under the next section of the bill as it is now prepared, which gives the Attorney-General authority to appoint assistants when peculiar necessity exists.

I do not care to elaborate the discussion of this matter or to take the time of the Senate. If this amendment should be adopted, I should like to see it followed by a similar one in respect to marshals, and I believe it would tend to the settlement of this vexed question upon a more enduring basis than the present aspect of the bill promises. If we have a difference in the salaries for the different districts based upon the theory that more work is done in some than in others, we shall at once invite year after year a constant repetition of solicitation upon Congress to correct inequalities caused by changes in the circumstances.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator state what his amendment is?

Mr. VILAS. The amendment I propose is to have the district attorneys in every district in the United States paid $4,000 a year except in the southern district of New York, which is a very special case. I propose that the present law with reference to his compensation shall continue; and I also except the district of Massachusetts, which includes the city of Boston; the eastern district of Pennsylvania, including the city of Philadelphia; the eastern district of Louisiana, including the city of New Orleans; the northern district of California, embracing the city of San Francisco, and the northern district of Illinois, with the city of Chicago. I propose that they shall each be paid $6,000. I would fix, in other words, arbitrarily, a certain salary for this term, and I leave it open for controversy hereafter. I believe the salary in each of those cases is ample and adequate to secure as effective, useful, valuable service for the Government as we have ever had by the district attorneys hitherto employed.

Mr. CULLOM. I sincerely hope that the amendment will not be adopted. I think it will result in killing the whole measure.

Mr. HILL. Why would it kill the whole measure?

Mr. CULLOM. Because it is not fair legislation, in my judgment.

Mr. HILL. That might be, and not necessarily kill the whole measure.

Mr. CULLOM. I think almost every other Senator will think the same way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not expect to occupy much of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the provisions which are proposed to be struck from the bill on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. I agree with all that has been said by Senators as to the impropriety of placing riders in the way of legislation on appropriation bills. The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], who laid great stress upon that point, can not outdo me in objecting as a rule to placing riders upon appropriation bills. I have heard the Senator from Ohio many times express his view upon that subject and I have never differed from him in his argument. I think I can say truthfully for all the members of the Committee on Appropriations that they do object to legislation upon these bills. They would greatly prefer to deal with the appropriation bills without respect to legislation upon them; and we always hope that as to every one of these bills the rule which prohibits general legislation upon them will be adhered to. The House of Representatives has a similar rule. So according to the rules of the two Houses legislation of a general character can not be put upon appropriation bills, and that question need not be debated here.

The only question which arises now, as it seems to me, is whether the situation and condition surrounding this question of the compensation of district attorneys and marshals take this proposed legislation out of the general rule which prevails here, and which ought to prevail. In the first place, so far as the Senate is concerned, it has no choice as respects this bill. These provisions came to us from the House of Representatives; they are in the bill; and in some form they must be dealt with here. I know perfectly well it would be an easy thing for us to adopt the motion proposed by the Senator from Ohio and strike them out; but that does not deal with the question which is presented to us in these sections, unless the Senate is ready, and it never has been ready so far as I know, to say to the House of Representatives, "We will not agree to pass this bill unless you strip it of the legislation which you propose." I agree that according to parliamentary law, and according to the just relations that should exist between the two Houses, when either House proposes on an appropriation bill new legislation, if the other House objects to it the legislation should be taken from the bill. That is the rule; nobody disputes it that I know of; and every member of the Senate, so far as I know, agrees with the suggestions made by the honorable Senator from Ohio, the Senator from New York, and other Senators who say that we should not legislate upon appropriation bills.

The Committee on Appropriations, however, in the consideration of this bill regarded, and were compelled to regard, this as an exceptional case; and they so treated it. The House of Representatives, with its rule providing that no legislation should be placed upon appropriation bills, took this proposed legislation out of the scope of that rule. The Committee on Rules, having the power to bring in special rules as respects special questions, overriding the general rules of the House, brought into that body a special rule; and so unanimous was the House of Representatives for this legislation that the yeas and nays were not called, as the record of the House shows, upon the adoption of that rule.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask him a question? What was precisely the special rule which the Committee on Rules reported?

Mr. ALLISON. The special rule provided that these sections which are now incorporated in the bill should be made in order upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and that the sections should be considered pending that bill, and they were so considered under that special rule. Otherwise, of course, the provisions would have been subject to a point of order, and ruled out.

Mr. HILL. I am seeking information. I was not aware that the Committee on Rules in the other House had a right to bring in a special rule which superseded one of the standing rules of the House for the consideration of bills in the House. Of course if the Senator says that that course was adopted, I accept his statement. I supposed what the Committee on Rules did was to expedite particular measures, stating how long the debate should be, and certain other details. I was not aware that it suspended one of the regular standing rules of the body relating to what should go into a bill. I may be misinformed.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I have the rule before me.

Mr. HILL. I wish the Senator would read it.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall be in order for the Committee on the Judiciary to offer, and for the House to consider in Committee of the Whole, as an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1897, the bill (H. R. 6654) entitled "A bill to abolish the fee system as to United States district attorneys and marshals and substitute salaries, and for other purposes."

Thus the Committee on Rules, which has the power to make special rules for special cases, in the exercise of that power in the House, without objection, practically, regarded these provisions as so exceptional in their nature and so important as to their consideration that they should be embodied in and ingrafted upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

All these provisions, I understand, received the careful scrutiny of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, not for a day, or a week, or a month, but for many weeks. The Attorney-General before the Committee on Appropriations of this body read in the presence of the committee every section and every provision of the bill, and stated to us that he had given this subject long, faithful, and careful attention during the winter months, and that every legislative provision here respecting the changes made necessary by the adoption of the salary clauses instead of the fee system received his unqualified support.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me for a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Of course the Senator from Iowa desires to state it with entire accuracy.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; so far as I can.

Mr. HILL. The House, after the elaborate investigation and deliberation referred to by the Senator, reported another provision to the bill to change the whole system relating to United States commissioners.

Mr. ALLISON. They did.

Mr. HILL. And after receiving the assent of the House Judiciary Committee, after receiving the assent of the House Appropriations Committee, after passing the House, the Attorney-General came before the committee, did he not, and disapproved of the whole proceeding?

Mr. ALLISON. I, of course——

Mr. HOAR. I do not like to interpose, but I wish to suggest to the Senator from Iowa whether it is in accordance with our rules to discuss a particular vote or majority or the proceedings in the other House.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is not, and I will make no further allusion to the House. That statement has been made heretofore by other Senators in dealing with the question, and I suppose that my reference to what occurred there would at least be not objected to.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator from Iowa to allow me to interrupt him for a moment or two so as to get some information.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Iowa has on two occasions in the Senate explained the difficulties that surround the matter. I have a serious difficulty about these provisions, which I desire to submit to the Senator from Iowa for solution. I understand, sir, the motive, the reason for the rule which excludes general legislation from an appropriation bill to be this: We are under a sort of moral and political necessity, in order to carry on the Government, to vote for and to pass general appropriation bills, so that when an amendment which is objectionable to a Senator or a majority of Senators is put on a bill and we can not get rid of it we are placed in an attitude where we must either vote for that which we do not approve or refuse the necessary appropriation for the Government. I should like the Senator to explain how any exceptional case can do away with the reason of that rule.

Mr. ALLISON. If I stated that this is an exceptional case, which in any sense changes the rule which I endeavored to state, namely, that if one House places new legislation upon an appropriation bill which the other House disagrees to, the House proposing the legislation must give way or themselves take the responsibility of a failure to pass an appropriation bill——

Mr. GEORGE. Why may we not pursue that course now?

Mr. ALLISON. I am stating as nearly as I can why I think we should deal with this question now. Of course I can not state it all in a sentence. I was stating, however, and I was not out of order, I believe, in stating what the rule of the House is and what an exception to its rules may be. Certainly it is in order in this body to read in debate the rules of the other House.

Mr. PLATT. There is no question about it.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in order to read the rules of the House in debate, I repeat. It is also in order to read every rule of the House. If you can read one rule, you can read all the rules. Therefore I submit to my honorable friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that I was not out of order in stating that this legislation was put on the bill in the House in accordance with the rule which I read.

Mr. HOAR. I did not suggest that the Senator was out of order.

Mr. ALLISON. Oh!

Mr. HOAR. I did not make any such point. The Senator will pardon me. I did not refer in what I did say to that. I referred to the Senator's statement about the unanimity of the House in a certain matter. Will the Senator allow me to take the book he has in his hand? I referred also to his statement about certain votes on this subject.

Mr. ALLISON. The only——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Iowa will pardon me. What I had in mind is this:

> It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses. (8 Grey, 22.)

That is Mr. Jefferson's statement. I merely asked the Senator himself to consider whether a statement about the opinion of the House and its unanimity was in order here. The Senator very properly said he did not think it was, in which I agree with him.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw that part of my statement as to the vote.

The Attorney-General, I repeat, stated that the provisions as to changing from the fee system to the salary system met with his approval. In reference to changing the law as respects commissioners of United States courts, the Attorney-General said to the Committee on Appropriations (I do not know what he said to the Committee on the Judiciary) that there was doubt in his mind as to many of those provisions, and he did not, without condition, recommend to either committee, as I understand, that the provisions as to commissioners should remain in the bill. Therefore, the Committee on Appropriations, as I understood, in accord with the view of the Committee on the Judiciary, struck out the provisions as to commissioners, and, in association with the Committee on the Judiciary, inserted a clause in the bill requiring the Attorney-General to make investigation and examination as to commissioners and clerks of the courts.

So at every step of this bill and of these provisions the Committee on Appropriations yielded to the judgment of the Committee on the Judiciary. We did so for the reason that we understood the Committee on the Judiciary at this session, as at many former sessions, had under consideration bills looking to a change in the method of compensation to district attorneys and marshals.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me, before he passes away from that matter?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I am not aware that there is any single provision on this subject reported or now recommended by the Committee on Appropriations in regard to which there is a difference of opinion between those two committees. Indeed, the Judiciary Committee also reported as bills what they reported as amendments to the pending bill.

In regard to the question whether this legislation should go on an appropriation bill, what I have said about it is merely my individual opinion and I have no authority to represent the committee at all. They have taken no action either way on that subject.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, it turns out that the Judiciary Committee have not only considered those provisions, but that they have also reported separate bills looking to the change which is proposed here.

I have made this narration for the purpose of showing or attempting to show that these are not amendments put into the bill on the floor of the Senate in haste upon the motion of a single Senator. They are not amendments that have not been considered by the two committees of this body, to say nothing of any other body, who have charge and jurisdiction of the subject. They have considered them. The provisions have the approval of the highest law officer of the Government; they have been debated in this body now for four days, and every Senator here has had his opportunity to criticise and to propose amendments to each and all of those sections.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the circumstances I have related which surround this important legislation are sufficient for us all to say that the provisions have been carefully and wisely considered by the highest law officer of the Government and by the two committees that necessarily have charge of those subjects. Certainly the committee of this body that has charge of the subject has considered them. If that be true the only question that should be considered, it seems to me, is whether or not the amendments are important. If they are important, then they have been carefully considered by the proper committees and by this body. The mere technical statement that they are all on an appropriation bill, whereas they should be in a separate measure, it occurs to me ought not to prevail.

I wish to say one thing further as to this matter. If I had my way, although I have not consulted anyone in reference to it, I should advise that as to these provisions, when the necessary appropriations have been concluded in regard to the pending bill, if there are serious differences between the two Houses upon the subject, those differences should be settled by the law committees of the two Houses and not by the Committees on Appropriations.

I believe that those provisions are valuable; that they are of importance; that in their general result they will greatly reduce the expenses of the Department of Justice, and that the compensation provided here even by the Senate amendments as to marshals and district attorneys is smaller than they now receive by law.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me for just a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the unfairness of this proceeding, and to hear his views upon that question.

Adopting the suggestion that was made from some source, without now speaking of the Attorney-General, the Appropriations Committee and the Judiciary Committee have reported to strike out of the bill quite a portion of it relating to United States commissioners. Among other matters which the House inserted was a provision which prevented any district clerk from being a United States commissioner. That part of it goes out. It has not been discussed here; it can not be discussed here, as there is nothing before the Senate in regard to it. That is a matter which seriously affects the southern district of New York. I have letters signed by every judge of the courts—the district court and the circuit court—by the district attorney, by the leading members of the bar of New York, making suggestions upon that branch of the case.

Now, you have not brought that provision here and perfected it. It is going out, according to the idea of the Senate. The conference committee meets, and that question is to be determined. The conferees on the part of the Senate may yield to the House. Then when the bill comes back here we can not amend it. We have to vote down the whole report of the conference committee and attack it in that way, imperiling an appropriation for the support of the Government. That is the unfairness of the whole proceeding, I submit to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree that the sections respecting commissioners were stricken out of the bill on the report of the committee and have not been debated, but those sections certainly will be debated in this Chamber before they are agreed to by the Senate. For one I will not agree to the provisions with respect to United States commissioners as they stand in the bill, nor have we or the Attorney-General the information which would enable us to deal intelligently with those commissioners and the clerks of the courts.

Although what the Senator says is embarrassing, it certainly would be much more embarrassing if, instead of striking out one or two sections relating to commissioners, we had struck out every section relating to marshals and district attorneys as well, and thus thrown those provisions into a conference without having had the opportunity of hearing the expression of Senators as to their justice or injustice.

Mr. President, having said this much as to the bill, I believe we ought to deal with the subject here and now. I believe that a great majority of the Senators upon this floor favor these provisions. Certainly the Judiciary Committee favor them, because they have reported similar provisions to this body in a separate bill. The Senator from New York favors them, and so stated in the debate yesterday. The provisions as reported to us by the Attorney-General will save annually large sums of money to the Government without impairing the efficiency of the courts of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROCTOR in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator explain how, by what process, a saving will be made to the Government, and how much it will be?

Mr. ALLISON. There have been many tables presented upon this subject in the House debate, and I believe two or three have been introduced here. I will not stop to discuss them. The estimate is that the annual saving will be about $500,000. I will refer the Senator to the House debate upon the subject, where elaborate tables were produced, prepared in the office of the Attorney-General.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there must be some misunderstanding about this matter, if my friend the Senator from Iowa will allow me, because we all want to get at the facts.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I understand, most of these officers are paid by fees which are levied according to law upon litigants. The United States pays fees in cases in which it is interested, and all other litigants pay fees. Those fees now pay the salaries of the district attorneys and the clerks, and probably the marshals to a certain extent, perhaps entirely.

The payment of these officers out of the Treasury will probably prevent the collection of fees. There will be no one interested in collecting the fees from parties litigant, and the result will be a large increase, in my judgment, whatever it may be nominally, in the expense of the Government and the expense of the courts, because the expenses which are now paid by fees will be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, with no assurance that the fees will be collected, as there is no one interested to collect them.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask whether the fees which the marshals and district attorneys receive are not payable by the defendants in cases and not by the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. They are paid, of course, by the loser in the suit, whoever he may be.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is there not the same motive for a district attorney or a marshal to collect fees which are adjudged by a court against the defendant that there is for an officer in the customs service to collect duties on imports or for an internal-revenue officer to collect excise duties? It seems to me the Senator from Ohio might as well say that we never will collect revenue under our customs laws because the officers have no interest in collecting it. It is the duty of the United States district attorney to tax and collect all costs against a defendant. In pretty nearly all the States of this Union, certainly in Massachusetts, the district attorney is paid by salary, but he collects the taxable costs against the defendant. I never heard of a suggestion that fees would not be collected because the officer himself was not interested. But what the salary system does remove is the motive on the part of officials to make litigation for the purpose of putting the fees in their pockets.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that what it invariably leads to is fewer indictments and more convictions?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I can not for a moment agree to the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio that the courts of the United States will fail in the discharge of their duties, because a statement that the fees will not be collected and paid is an imputation upon every judge of our courts and upon every lawyer who has the ability and capacity to become a district attorney of the United States. These are sworn officers. The fees are required to be paid into the Treasury, whether drawn from private litigants or from actions in which the United States is a party. All fees which will be collected after these provisions shall take effect will be paid into the Treasury of the United States. Walk across this corridor and you will find there the highest judicial tribunal in the world, with private litigants without number, and a fee bill which, to the losing litigant, is regarded as very large. Every dollar of that fee bill and of those fees, by a statute of the United States, is paid into the Treasury of the United States, although the litigants are private parties.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand that the Senator from Iowa relies with implicit confidence upon the integrity of the district attorneys and also of the courts, but mainly the district attorneys, who are the active agents in this matter, that all the fees will be collected. I understand (if I am wrong in this I desire to be corrected) that the main reason for changing from the fee system to the salary system is because the district attorneys can not be relied upon, and that they use the powers of their office unjustly and improperly for the purpose of increasing their fees.

Mr. ALLISON. The courts of the United States, like other courts, have their judges, their district attorneys, their marshals or sheriffs, as the case may be, and their commissioners. If a deputy marshal finds what he believes to be a case of wrongdoing as respects a United States statute, he commences a proceeding. That proceeding can not be commenced by a private citizen without the sanction of the district attorney. Therefore it is that I have no doubt that in some cases deputy marshals have inaugurated suits, which have resulted in large fees, that the laws compel the district attorney to deal with, although he may not believe that the cases ought to be dealt with. But I submit that these fees which go into the Treasury of the United States will continue to go there.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a single remark? The Judiciary Committee has had this matter before it a long time. I have received a great many communications on this subject, and the complaints in this particular are not of the dictrict attorneys, but of deputy marshals and commissioners. The complaint is that the fees are multiplied and cases put off, taking three days where the work might be done in one, and ten witnesses being summoned when two would answer, and all that class of complaints, but not relating to the district attorneys. Certainly in some instances among the most earnest advocates of this change have been district attorneys, who say that it is impossible for them to control the matter as it now stands.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me just one word, and then I shall quit?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. In response to the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that if the fault is not in the district attorney's office, but in the marshal's office, there is no necessity for a change from the fee system to the salary system in the district attorney's office; the change ought to be confined to the marshal's office.

While I am up I believe I will say that I am authorized to state that no such abuse as has been alluded to in the debate here about deputy marshals and marshals putting up cases improperly for the purpose of obtaining fees exists in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not care to go into that question. I will only refer the Senator from Mississippi to the page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which that showing appeared. It is of the date of March 4, 1896, page 2452, in which there is a full statement of the whole question.

What I mean to say is, as to this whole subject, that it having been thus dealt with at large by the Department and by the proper committees of the two Houses, all recommending that these changes should be made, all concurring that this is wise legislation, it seems to me that it is an unwise thing now, after having perfected it so nearly, that we shall in this method remove from the bill all these safeguards and provisions merely because, under our rules and the general rules of the House of Representatives, and under the ordinary rules of parliamentary procedure, this proposed legislation should not be on an appropriation bill.

I sympathize with every suggestion which has been made here as to the impropriety of putting legislation upon an appropriation bill. If the Judiciary Committee had come into this body and stated that any one of these provisions was unwise, and that they objected to it because of its unwisdom, I should be the last Senator here who would insist upon retaining it in the bill. So, without any feeling about it, I shall vote against the motion of the Senator from Ohio, believing that as we have progressed thus far with this important subject we may intelligently complete it in the pending bill.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I agree, as I have already said, with the Senator from Iowa in his approbation of the provisions of the bill. They are substantially the same as the provisions which have been agreed to by the Judiciary Committee, which were reported in two private bills. I sympathize, however, with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] in the objection to putting them on an appropriation bill.

The Senator from Iowa does not seem to have answered the principal argument, which is, that when this goes down to the House of Representatives and comes back the proposition of the committee of conference can not be amended; that we shall have the naked question presented to us whether to swallow or reject the whole dose; and we shall be obliged to agree with the other House or take the risk of the defeat of the appropriation bill.

You have no right, it seems to me, to tie to a bill for carrying on the Government any general legislation. It is in effect the working of the old threat to withhold the supplies from the Government unless the House of Commons had its way in some particular measure. The Senator from Iowa simply says he agrees to all that, that it is a bad thing to put general legislation on appropriation bills, and the Senate is acting under a species of duress when the thing is done, etc. It is not that this particular thing is not right; it is not as to what the Senate wants; it is that you are inevitably, in all probability, going to have brought about in the future something which will be wrong, and that the Senate does not want, proposed elsewhere, and that you have got to take or leave.

The fact that this is a great temptation, and not a little one, to violate a principle, that it is violating it to get something you want instead of something you do not want, does not control my judgment, as it seems to control the judgment of my honorable friend from Iowa. The Senator from Iowa seems to me very much like the Scotch lassie who met Walter Scott on one occasion. She told him that she had always found in her experience that the best way to get rid of a temptation was just to yield to it. [Laughter.] That seems to be my honorable friend's notion in regard to the proper rule of procedure.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I want a yea-and-nay vote on this question, and I suggest the absence of a quorum in order that we may first get Senators in.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt absent Senators are within hearing, and they will come in if we proceed to vote.

Mr. HILL. My idea was first to give them a little notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested.

Mr. CULLOM. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	Jones Ark.	Proctor,
Allison,	Cullom,	Lindsay,	Quay,
Baker,	Daniel,	McBride,	Sherman,
Bate,	Davis,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Berry,	Dubois,	Mantle,	Smith,
Blackburn,	Elkins,	Mills,	Stewart,
Brice,	Faulkner,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Teller,
Burrows,	Frye,	Mitchell, Wis.	Turpie,
Caffery,	Gear,	Nelson,	Vilas,
Call,	George,	Pasco,	Walthall,
Cannon,	Hale,	Peffer,	White,
Carter,	Hill,	Perkins,	Wolcott.
Chilton,	Hoar,	Platt,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. HILL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have the amendment stated so that I may know what we are to vote upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is to strike out sections 5 to 20, inclusive.

Mr. GEORGE. All that relates to the marshals and district attorneys?

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator has the bill before him, he will see that those are the sections which refer to United States attorneys and marshals.

Mr. GEORGE. That is satisfactory.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I notice that my pair, the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], is not present. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I will withhold my vote. If I were allowed to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. He is unavoidably absent, and I will withhold my vote.

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. Can his colleague inform me how that Senator would vote upon this question?

Mr. PUGH. My colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY. Then I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to inquire whether the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. CARTER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland, and not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MANTLE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. However, it covers only political questions. Hence I am at liberty to vote upon this matter.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Baker,	Daniel,	Mantle,	Turpie,
Bate,	George,	Mills,	Vilas,
Blackburn,	Hill,	Pasco,	White.
Caffery,	Hoar,	Sherman,
Chilton,	Lindsay,	Smith,

NAYS—30.

Aldrich,	Cockrell,	McBride,	Quay,
Allison,	Davis,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Berry,	Dubois,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Burrows,	Elkins,	Nelson,	Teller,
Butler,	Faulkner,	Peffer,	Vest,
Call,	Frye,	Platt,	Wolcott.
Cannon,	Hale,	Proctor,
Clark,	Jones, Ark.	Pugh,

NOT VOTING—41.

Allen,	Gibson,	Martin,	Squire,
Bacon,	Gordon,	Mitchell, Wis.	Thurston,
Blanchard,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Tillman,
Brice,	Gray,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Hansbrough,	Murphy,	Walthall,
Cameron,	Harris,	Palmer,	Warren,
Carter,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Wetmore,
Chandler,	Irby,	Pettigrew,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Jones, Nev.	Pritchard,
Gallinger,	Kyle,	Roach,
Gear,	Lodge,	Sewell,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HILL. On page 61 of the printed bill, I move to strike out, in line 4, commencing with the word "Provided," down to the end of line 14. Upon that question, after it is stated, I desire to say a few words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," line 4, page 61, it is proposed to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the next session of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico shall commence on the first Monday in May, 1897, and each succeeding session thereof shall commence on the first Monday in May of every odd-numbered year thereafter: Provided further, That no other officer of either house of said legislative assembly shall be elected or appointed, or paid out of any moneys appropriated by the Congress of the United States, or by the legislative assembly of said Territory than such as may be provided for by the laws of the United States except a translator and an interpreter.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the motion which I have made to amend presents again the question of the propriety of general legislation upon an appropriation bill. It ought not to require much argument to convince the Senate that this amendment should be carried. Why Congress can not make an appropriation for the support of the government of New Mexico without adding provisions changing the date of the meeting of the legislature and otherwise regulating the affairs of that Territory, I can not see.

This proposed legislation is not asked for by the legislature of New Mexico. I have letters from nearly all its members, especially those who belong to my own political party, protesting against this legislation as partisan. I have letters from the governor of the Territory protesting against this legislation as partisan. It is not asked for by the governor of the Territory. It is not asked for by the legislature. It is sought to be sneaked in under this appropriation bill.

There is already pending here a bill relating to the Territory of New Mexico. It has been considered, not by the Appropriations Committee—it has been considered by the appropriate committee, the Committee on Territories. They have reported that bill. It is here upon our files ready for action at the proper time. If this political amendment is necessary and proper, why is it not placed in that bill?

Mr. President, we might as well be plain with one another. The object of putting in this amendment is to force Executive approval. That is all there is of it. It can not be defended upon any other ground. Under existing laws the legislature of that Territory, the Democratic legislature, will assemble in December next, and this little trick is to postpone it until May, for the laudable purpose, it is believed, that by that time there may be a Republican President of the United States, and a Republican governor and all the other officers of the Territory to be appointed. If there have been excuses in the past for the placing of partisan legislation upon appropriation bills, it could at least be said in justification for it that they were great party measures; that they were put on when great exigencies in public affairs existed; that it could not be done otherwise, and that party interests required it to be done. Mr. President, this is a small, mean, contemptible, silly provision, and an attempt to get party advantage through the appropriation bill.

In the first place, I invoke the eloquent speech of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who said he is opposed to putting amendments of general legislation upon an appropriation bill. But his excuse was that the provision which we have just voted upon relating to marshals and district attorneys was a great reform. Everything goes in the name of reform nowadays. If a man wants to do some questionable thing, he invokes the name of reform. If you want to secure the adoption of any questionable provision, it is a reform provision. The Senator from Iowa said that if there was great opposition to the provision relating to marshals and district attorneys, then it ought not to be pressed, but he spoke of the great unanimity in the other House in favor of that reform; he spoke of the unanimity here upon the general question of the propriety of the change of the system. What unanimity is there for this amendment? Will anybody tell me who is asking for it except the Delegate from New Mexico?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator from New York speaks of it as an amendment. It is a part of the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. HILL. I speak of it as an amendment in a general appropriation bill. In that respect I am entirely accurate. It was put in in the House; that is true. That much is to be said, of course, in defense of the Appropriations Committee; they did not put it in; they tolerated it, that is all.

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him a question? The Senator says it was "sneaked" in. What does he mean? How does he know, and upon what authority, that it was sneaked in?

Mr. HILL. I thought I would stir up the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ELKINS. I am glad you did.

Mr. HILL. I have witnessed day after day his friend who sits by his side here looking after this little amendment. In three minutes by the clock after my motion was made he comes in here to defend this little amendment, to whisper in the ear of our friends on the other side that it is vital for his party in that Territory. What I mean by "sneaked in" is because a little partisan advantage of this kind is unworthy to be placed upon a great appropriation bill of the Government. Will the Senator from the State of New Mexico—I have got that wrong; it is substantially that, though, I guess—will the Senator from West Virginia tell me why this was not brought up in the Committee on Territories? I am a member of that committee, and he is a member of it. Why was it not brought up there, in the proper committee? Can not some other committee than the Appropriations Committee of the Senate be trusted to take care of important amendments like this?

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator from New York has not answered my question. I should like to have him answer it before he asks me another. It is a serious charge that he has made about the provision being inserted by the House of Representatives, that it was sneaked into the bill. Let the Senator confine himself to the word "sneaked."

Mr. HILL. I will explain precisely what I mean by it. In the first place, it has no business here, legitimately, properly; it ought not to be here. That is what I mean by it. I mean it was put in in violation of the rules of the House. That is what I mean.

Mr. ELKINS. Is not the other House the judge of its own rules and regulations and proceedings? How can the Senator attack the House and what the House does?

Mr. HILL. According to the statement made this morning by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] they have no rules. It has been shown that they have their standing rules, all made, published, placed in the Manual, and new members who come in examine them and they see how all their rights are protected. But they have another provision by which the Committee on Rules meet fifteen minutes before a bill is to be considered and set aside all their rules, one and all of them. So I am strictly accurate in saying that substantially there are no rules of the House of Representatives to-day, but whatever rules they do have in form, on paper, they overrule. Therefore I say that the amendment was sneaked in; it crept in. That is the reason for it.

Now, Mr. President, what is the effect of this provision? The fiscal year of that Territory ends March 1. How is the government to be supported from March 1 until May, when the legislature meets? It is not provided for. Who has asked for this change? Where does it come from? What officials of the Territory there have asked for it? Will the Senator from West Virginia—I have got it right this time, or substantially right—deny that this is a political amendment?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I do deny it. The Senator from New York says in one breath that this is a violation of the rules and in the next breath he says that they have no rules.

Mr. HILL. And I am substantially correct in both statements.

Mr. ELKINS. He again lays emphasis on the word "sneaked." That is an inconsistency which I wish the Senator from New York would explain.

Mr. HILL. If I have not explained it sufficiently, even to the comprehension of the Senator from West Virginia, I shall not attempt it again. I have said they have certain standing rules, of which I was speaking. They are rules carefully prepared, rules printed in the Manual, rules published to the world to show how fairly the rights of minorities are protected. Those are the standing rules. Those rules forbid the placing of general legislation upon appropriation bills. Then they have another arrangement invented, no matter by whom, by which the Committee on Rules reports special rules to pass a particular bill.

Who ever heard before in the history of the House of Representatives of the necessity for bringing in a special rule to pass a great appropriation bill for the support of the Government, which we all recognize must be passed? Mr. President, never before; and it is not necessary to be done, because every Senator and every Member of the other House stands ready at all times to vote for supplies to run the Government of the United States. Say what you will about either House of Congress, all the members are willing to provide adequate moneys for the support of the Government.

Mr. President, this provision did not get in here by accident. Oh, no. It is placed here deliberately; placed for partisan advantage; placed for a purpose. It is not placed in a regular Territorial bill. It has never been considered by the Territorial Committee of the Senate at all. I have attended nearly every session of that committee until to-day. This question has not been brought up. We have discussed all other questions relating to New Mexico; but this question never has been suggested. It comes in here, gets in, crawls into this appropriation bill.

Who has said that the month of May is the proper time for the meeting of the Territorial legislature? I have a remonstrance from people who say that at that time many of the people there are engaged in the great sheep industry of that Territory. They do not want the legislature to meet in May. They protest against it. Why not meet as it has been in the habit of meeting, in December? What point is there except a political point?

Now, when the Senator from West Virginia denies that this is a political amendment it shows his capacity. I say he is equal to the emergency. Of course he has got to deny it, if he has not already. The other Senator from West Virginia, not from New Mexico, says he did not really squarely deny it. I am assuming he will have to deny it, of course, before this debate is over. He will have to deny it, because he does not want to come here and father this little amendment containing a contemptible political advantage in an appropriation bill and say we had to put it in there because we doubted whether we could get it in in any other way. Oh, no, Mr. President; he has got to say that this is in the interest of the people of the Territory and not a partisan amendment, and he is amazed to find any objection to it raised here. Did he not know that the governor of the Territory is opposed to it? Does he not know that a large number of the members of the legislature are opposed to it? If he knows as much about that Territory as I think he does, he knows of the opposition to this provision.

Mr. President, are we to be told again that it is necessary to put this provision in the bill? I invoke all the arguments made that nobody would think of putting it in an appropriation bill unless it was not by unanimous consent but by a sort of common consent. The only argument advanced here in favor of the amendment for marshals and district attorneys was that everybody was in favor of it.

Mr. President, I can not see why this should be pressed at this time. I can not see upon what ground it can be defended. Assume, for the purposes of the argument, that it is a proper amendment; assume, for the purposes of the argument, that the governor of the Territory is in favor of it; assume, for the purposes of the argument, that the legislature wants it, all of which is untrue, then what is the necessity to put it on this bill anyhow? Are these appropriation bills to be made mere sewers to put in odds and ends and scraps that everybody wants to place in a bill? I hope not.

I hold in my hand letters and papers from that Territory in which they are opposed to this amendment. I say it is uncalled for. I say it is unnecessary. I say there is no necessity for changing the date of the meeting of the legislature under these circumstances. Before I proceed further, I want to hear the reasons for this provision upon the other side, if there is any other side.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I shall not become so much excited at least as my distinguished friend from New York over the provision.

Mr. HILL. Not the slightest. I am under no excitement at all. I never was cooler in my life.

Mr. CULLOM. I was a little uneasy for fear the Senator might have a spasm over it before he got through.

Mr. HILL. The spasm is on the other side.

Mr. CULLOM. Not the slightest. This provision was put on in the House of Representatives, if I may be allowed to refer to that body, which I regard as out of order. The provision came to us just as it appears in the bill, with the exception that the words "except a translator and an interpreter" were added by the Committee on Appropriations of this body. The Delegate from the Territory appeared before the committee in favor of the retention of the provision, and desired additional amendments to it, which the Committee on Appropriations declined to give, except as to the words which I have quoted. I heard nothing and I think no member of the committee heard anything said about any politics that might be involved in it. Whether there is any, I am not prepared to say. The Delegate insisted that it would be in the interest of the Territory if the time for the commencement of the legislature should be fixed as is provided in the bill. I did not hear very much from the Delegate, because we told him early that we could not add any additional amendments to it.

I desire to say in behalf of the honorable gentleman who represents that Territory in the other body that he is a gentleman of character. He is a gentleman of eminent ability as a lawyer, perhaps as much so as any man living in the Territory. He comes here by the votes of the people of that Territory, and he had a perfect right to be heard in the Committee on Appropriations if he desired to be heard before the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Illinois recall the fact that Governor Thornton was before us and stated——

Mr. CULLOM. I was about to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

Mr. CULLOM. Before that time, however, we had sent for the Delegate to know whether he had anything which he desired to say. The governor of the Territory was before us and objected to the time named in the provision which was incorporated in the bill in the other branch. He preferred that it should be on the first Monday of January, instead of the first Monday of May, but, as I remember it (and the Senator from Missouri will correct me if I am mistaken), he stated that if there was any change made in the time of the meeting of the legislature he preferred it should be in February or March. Am I right in that?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; his statement was that he preferred to have the legislature meet in January.

Mr. CULLOM. I know he preferred January. He desired it should meet in January, but if any change should be made he did not want it later than February or March.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not later than March.

Mr. CULLOM. That is my recollection of his testimony. There was nothing of a partisan nature suggested by either of the distinguished gentlemen who were before us. The governor seemed to be a gentleman of character and intelligence. He is a gentleman whom I never had the honor of knowing before. The Delegate I have known for a number of years. I am prepared to say that so far as I have any information, both those distinguished men are honorable gentlemen and both of them had a right to represent to Congress or to either branch of it what their views and wishes were with reference to legislation.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me refresh the memory of the Senator from Illinois. Does he not remember that Governor Thornton stated, after he had gotten through and made his suggestions, that it was due to the committee, or due to himself, that he should state it was a political matter?

Mr. CULLOM. Possibly he may have made that remark after he got through.

Mr. COCKRELL. After he had given his reasons, after the whole question was discussed, then he went on to state fully that this was purely a political matter.

Mr. CULLOM. He may have stated that, but there was not apparently——

Mr. COCKRELL. There was not a word said about politics until after the whole question was discussed.

Mr. CULLOM. That may be true.

Mr. COCKRELL. And then, before he left, you will remember he told us he felt it to be due to himself, as well as to the committee, to state that they regarded it as a political question?

Mr. GEORGE. We can not hear on this side the colloquy that is going on.

Mr. HILL. Who made that statement?

Mr. COCKRELL. Governor Thornton.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Missouri states what the governor of the Territory said before our committee after the general statement which he was called upon to make had been concluded. I have rather an indefinite recollection of what he did say, because I was not impressed that there was much of anything in the subject. However, the governor stated, and so the Senator from Missouri says, that it was a political scheme or measure, and I take it for granted that the Senator from Missouri recollects definitely what was said by him. Now, whether it was or not, the governor argued that the 1st of May was at a time in the year when it was troublesome for members of the legislature or others engaged in agricultural pursuits to attend the legislature at all, because it was the season when the sheep needed to be attended to, etc., but there was no very strong impression made upon anybody's mind, I think, that there was very earnest objection to the provision in the bill. While it may have been out of order to put it on the bill, as it certainly would have been in the Senate in the first instance, having been embodied in the bill before it passed the House without very much or any discussion, the committee did not take any steps looking to getting rid of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will suspend to enable the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside without losing its rights until the appropriation bill is concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a very few words more to say. I have felt that the honorable Senator from New York was a little severe, and that it was rather untimely for him to talk about this provision being sneaked into the bill by anybody or from any quarter. I hope he did not mean to reflect upon the Delegate from that Territory or upon anybody else. It got into the bill publicly by being introduced, I suppose, in committee in the other body, and adopted by that body without closed doors or any means which would look toward an unfair advantage. Certainly the Delegate from the Territory has a right to represent his Territory just as any Senator upon this floor or any Member of the other branch has a right to represent his State, taking his own view of what is best after looking into the question.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Was any specific fact or series of facts stated to the committee which showed that it was improper to hold the legislature in November and that it was proper to hold it in May? I should like to know as to that point.

Mr. CULLOM. There was some talk, and I have just been looking to see whether anything was taken down. I regret very much that the statements of the Delegate as well as those of the governor were not reported and printed for the use of the committee. However, they were not, as I find, and I did not charge my memory very closely in reference to what was said either by the governor or the Delegate as to specific reasons for or against the proposition. The Delegate representing the Territory——

Mr. HILL. Was it heard before a subcommittee or the full committee?

Mr. CULLOM. It was before a subcommittee, as I remember.

Mr. HILL. Not before the full committee?

Mr. CULLOM. The matter was subsequently before the full committee, of course, but the hearing was not before it.

Mr. HILL. No.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate longer. I should like to have a vote upon the amendment so as to dispose of it as soon as possible in some way.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I wish to state that on the vote to strike out the provisions in the bill in regard to the salaries of marshals and district attorneys, I voted "nay." I did so for the reason that for years an effort has been made in both Houses to establish the salary system. I believe it is most important to the entire country that the fee system for marshals and district attorneys should be dispensed with, and a salary system placed in lieu of it.

I would not have voted for those provisions on an appropriation bill had it not been shown that the matter was thoroughly considered by the Judiciary Committee of the House. The salaries were arranged by that committee, and it went from that committee to the Appropriations Committee and was placed on the bill, coming from the Judiciary Committee in the House. When the proposition came here the Appropriations Committee referred it to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, which was the proper committee to deal with the subject. The result was that both the Judiciary Committees in the House and in the Senate have thoroughly considered these provisions of the bill; they have been placed there, and there is at present no other way by which legislation can be had on that subject.

Many of the salaries are too high, and I would not have voted for them for that reason separately; but believing, even high as they are, that there will be a great saving, taking the entire country over, I voted against striking out the provisions. In my own State the salaries fixed by the bill will be $4,000 less for the two marshals and the two district attorneys than under the present fee system.

But this is a great and important question. It is a question which affects the entire country. It is not political. It is out of the ordinary when it is put upon an appropriation bill, but it is only put there after thorough consideration by the committees of the two Houses that have charge of this subject.

The matter directly before the Senate—in regard to the time of meeting of the legislature in New Mexico—I understand, was never considered by the Committee on Territories. The Committee on Appropriations is not supposed to be familiar with or to know so well as the Committee on Territories what is required in the Territory of New Mexico. This provision comes in on an appropriation bill from the House without having been considered by the Committee on Territories of this body, and so far as I know, although I do not know as to that, by that committee in the House of Representatives.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] says that some political advantage is sought. I do not know how that is, but if it be true it seems to me it is very small politics to ask the House to make a rule to put into an appropriation bill a subject-matter that does not belong here, in no way connected with the appropriation bill, in order to gain a political advantage, if that be the purpose.

If we can not enforce strictly and literally the rule that no general legislation shall go on appropriation bills, it seems to me all important that matters of this kind, which have not been considered by the proper committees, should not be put on an appropriation bill. And it is especially objectionable to attempt to pass political legislation in this way when it could not otherwise receive favorable consideration.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is important, apparently, that the Senate should understand the particular portion of the bill affected by the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. Since the first organization of the Territorial form of government in 1787, Congress has reserved unto itself the right not only to direct what can be done by Territorial legislatures, but likewise the right absolutely to abrogate any law passed by a Territorial legislature which does not appeal to the judgment of Congress as for the best interest of the people domiciled in that section of the country. Therefore, in attempting to place certain restrictions upon the authority of the legislature of New Mexico no innovation upon time-honored precedent is undertaken by the provision sought to be stricken out.

First, the provision designates the month of May instead of the month of December for the meeting of the Territorial legislature. Second, it provides that the Territorial authorities shall not be vested with the power to employ or pay for the use or service of the legislative assembly any person or persons in addition to those provided for by act of Congress to perform clerical service, except an interpreter.

With reference to the first matter, designating the time for the meeting of the legislature, I understand the fact to be that the legislature of the Territory meets in the month of December under existing law, and the meeting at that time brings about a state of affairs which I will describe. The election returns shall be filed with the secretary of the Territory within fifteen days after the election. In the case of a contest occurring, thirty days shall be allowed in which to give notice of intention to contest. This notice manifestly, under the law, would embody the complaint, as in an ordinary proceeding in the courts, setting forth the cause of action. Eight days are allowed for an answer to be filed. Thus the issue in a contested case would be framed. After the framing of the issue sixty days' time is allowed for the preparation of evidence or the presentation of the testimony. This allows a sufficient time in all for the meeting, the sessions, and the expiration of the legislative session before a hearing on a contested election case can occur.

So cases of fraud presented after the election in the Territory of New Mexico go unwhipped of justice. Instances are cited of cases after the last election wherein the secretary of the Territory by arbitrary and unauthorized action, in defiance of law and the will of the majority, placed upon the rolls of the legislature of the Territory a large number of men who did not have the semblance of credentials of any kind, character, or description. They were placed upon the roll as members of the Territorial legislature simply from and because of the fact that they had been candidates at the election and were defeated, while those who held credentials regular in form, commissioned by a majority of the people to represent them in territorial council, were absolutely deprived of the privilege by the fiat of the secretary of the Territory, who had supreme authority to make up the preliminary roll.

Thereafter, owing to this peculiar condition of things, allowing time to elapse within which the Territorial session would expire before a contest could be brought to a hearing, the people of the Territory were placed in the remarkable position of being represented by gentlemen whom they did not elect at all. It is now proposed to place the session of the legislature in the month of May, to the end that persons contesting the regularity of the seat of a member of the legislature may have a day in court, in the proper forum, before the legislature adjourns.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from Montana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. With pleasure.

Mr. FAULKNER. Why, then, put in May, which is a very busy season with the people of that country, to accomplish the object which the Senator suggests? Why could it not be done by fixing the time suggested by the governor and other officers of the Territory, either in February or March?

Mr. CARTER. I will state in reply to the question suggested to me by the Senator from West Virginia that the question propounded by him was propounded to the Delegate of the Territory of New Mexico by me, and he replied that the people in the rural districts were very largely engaged in sheep husbandry, and that if the legislature should convene in the month of February it would interfere seriously with the attendance at the legislature of persons who happen to be engaged in that line of enterprise, whereas in that far southern region the shearing concludes in the latter part of April, and the month of May is comparatively free from any preoccupying engagements.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Montana that that is just exactly the reason the governor gave in his testimony before the subcommittee, as I understood, why May or April should not be selected, because April and the early part of May come in the busy season in reference to the sheep industry.

Mr. CARTER. That brings up a question as between those two gentlemen which can readily be determined by reference to ordinary geographical and climatic conditions. In the far northern region of Montana, on the Canadian line, the lambing and shearing season concludes in the month of June, and I am persuaded that as between the governor and the Delegate from New Mexico, the climatic and geographical argument is on the side of the Delegate.

Now, with reference to the second proposition presented by the Senator, to strike out that portion of the bill which restricts the local officers from fixing undue burdens upon the people by employing extra force in the legislature, I can speak from some experience, having been for a considerable number of years under the dominion of a Territorial form of government in our Commonwealth. The experience in the last legislature in New Mexico was this: Congress, contemplating the necessities of 36 members of the legislature, 24 in the house and 12 in the council of that Territory, provided ample clerical force for the transaction of the detail and necessary business. The Government of the nation pays the legislative expenses to the limit fixed by Congress. In addition, however, and I venture to say without any existing necessity for the act, in reckless disregard of public economy, the legislature of the Territory of New Mexico affixed for clerk hire $13,000 upon the people of that struggling community in addition to the Congressional appropriation. The second proposition, then, sought to be stricken out by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], is the restriction which prevents a recurrence of that abuse.

Relative to the appearance upon this floor of the Delegate from New Mexico a word should be said. I am glad the distinguished Senator from New York called the attention of the people of New Mexico, through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to the fact that their Delegate is here discharging his duty. By reference to the law providing for Delegates in Congress from the Territories the Senator will observe that it is not a Delegate to the House whom the Territorial citizens elect, but a Delegate to Congress, and the right of a Delegate to Congress is as strong upon this floor as upon the floor of the House of Representatives.

It is unfortunate that 200,000 people domiciled in New Mexico, law-abiding American citizens, who have conquered 122,000 square miles of territory, who have all the necessary qualifications for Statehood, should be voiceless in this Chamber and without a vote anywhere in those matters concerning their own destiny. Since the privilege is accorded the Delegate to appear upon this floor, his appearance must be mentioned to his credit and not to his detriment.

Mr. HILL. I find no fault with the Delegate from New Mexico for discharging his duties. On the contrary, it is very commendable upon his part. I do not understand that it is a part of his duty, however, to endeavor to place upon appropriation bills amendments of this character. I do not think he has any superior rights to Senators or Members. I am not speaking of the Delegate personally. I am speaking of the propriety of a Delegate so anxious to accomplish political purposes that he deems it his duty to insist to his party friends upon having a political provision agreed to, embarrassing them.

I am sure that the fair-minded men upon the other side of the Chamber were not aware of the political character of this provision in the first instance, when it was proposed. The Senator who last addressed the Senate knew all about it. He remained silent when I was making the accusation that it was a political provision, and he heard the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who is equal to every emergency in that line, get up and strenuously deny that it is a political provision. In a few moments the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] rose at his place and admitted the whole thing, that it is political in its character, for the very purpose of regulating the political affairs of that Territory.

What committee of this body has corroborated the Senator's statement? Not one. He has denounced the action of a Democratic secretary of the Territory. Where has the secretary been heard? What committee of this body considered this legislation? None. Sir, while complaining of me because I commented upon the diligence with which the Delegate has looked after the provision while it has been pending here, I beg to ask whether it was entirely in good faith for the Senator from Montana to assail the secretary of the Territory, who has no one to speak in his behalf, and has not had any opportunity here to be heard?

If you wish to pass a proposition like this, go at it like business men. Introduce it and have it referred to a committee. Let the opposition be heard. Let testimony be taken. If there is a great overwhelming necessity for this little, contemptible, political provision, let the subject be thoroughly investigated. Fellow-Senators upon the other side, am I asking anything but what is right?

Mr. President, what the secretary did or did not do, I can not inform you. I have some letters in regard to the matter, portions of which it would not be proper for me to read here. They are personal letters explaining this matter. I conversed with the governor when he was here. I learned the character of the provision. Is there any doubt about its character? Is there a Senator upon the other side, fair-minded men who do not want to be mixed up in this little petty squabble, who does not know what it is?

I ask whether there is a good reason for insisting on this provision? Let us see. In the first place, they want a change made from December to May as to the session of the legislature. The first question which would arise when men are asked to pass upon the matter is, What is the point to it? In the first place, what is the political complexion of the legislature? It is a Democratic legislature. Who suggested the amendment? The Republican Delegate from the Territory. I think a Democrat would want to know immediately, What is the point to it? What is the reason for it? Who is asking for it, the legislature? Does the governor ask for it? Whence does it come?

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from New York allow me?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I will state that the legislature to be elected next November is the legislature to which I expect this particular provision would apply, and consequently the political character, so far as narrow partisanship is concerned, which the Senator refers to, can not be applied to a condition wholly unknown, for the clear reason that we can not predict what the political complexion of that legislature will be.

Mr. HILL. Do any of the members hold over?

Mr. CARTER. There are no holdovers.

Mr. HILL. None at all?

Mr. CARTER. There are no holdovers, either in the council or in the house. The entire legislature will be elected.

Mr. HILL. Who is the secretary of the Territory now?

Mr. COCKRELL. Lorion Miller is the secretary.

Mr. HILL. What is his politics?

Mr. CARTER. I am not informed. I suppose the Senator from Missouri can give the information.

Mr. COCKRELL. The secretary of the Territory is a Democrat.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Missouri says he is a Democrat.

Mr. CARTER. Very well.

Mr. HILL. I understood the Senator from Montana to say that the same secretary at another time virtually organized the legislature.

Mr. CARTER. That is the statement made to me by an authority in which I place great reliance.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senator whether the same secretary will not in December substantially organize the legislature?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir; without time——

Mr. HILL. There is where the point is.

Mr. CARTER. Without time for any contestant to be heard prior to the adjournment of the legislature or the expiration of the session by limitation.

Mr. HILL. It is not quite the thing, it strikes me, for Congress to attempt to regulate the length of time that a Territorial legislature shall sit merely for the purpose of determining the question of contested seats, nor do I think that mere loose allegations, not investigated, not proved, where the parties accused have had no hearing, constitute a sufficient argument why we should change existing laws to accomplish this result.

As the bill passed the House of Representatives with these provisions they limited and restricted the legislature to the appointment of only such officers as were expressly authorized by the Congressional act. The legislature has heretofore authorized translators or interpreters, and properly so. Sir, one-half or two-thirds of the people of that Territory speak the Spanish language, and it was necessary that they should have those officers. So long as the strict acts of Congress did not provide for it the legislature felt as though they were constrained to provide for their appointment. While the Delegate from the Territory did not look after this matter in the House of Representatives, the committee very properly added these exceptions.

Mr. President, I moved to strike out the whole provision because it is special legislation. The two distinct amendments go together; they are both legislative matters. One is clearly political; the other not so much so, and the amendment which has been added by the Committee on Appropriations is substantially unobjectionable. But I make the motion to strike it all out because it is legislation which does not belong here.

I have listened in vain in the elaborate apology made for this action by the Senator from Illinois for some reason why this should not be placed upon the bill for the admission of New Mexico. What reason has been stated? Why place it upon this bill?

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] gives the case away. He was right; he is a fair man. He will not attempt to say that this is not a political amendment, intended for advantage. I will spend no more time upon this question. Whether it is a political amendment or not, if we muster courage to accept the statement of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] that it is not, why should it be placed here? What good reason can be urged for such legislation in this bill?

Mr. President, it is the duty of the Committee on Territories to investigate Territorial questions. I have been on that committee for several years. I served under the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] who sits upon this side of the Chamber. We have never heard of this measure. The first we saw of it was when it turned up in this bill, and we have to get such information as we can in regard to it. Let it be stricken from the bill by common consent. If it is not a political amendment, as the Senator from West Virginia says it is not, why not let it go out by common consent and let it take its place in the regular bill for the admission of New Mexico and stand or fall with that bill?

Mr. President, it is put in here for the purpose of coercing us to pass it. It is put in here for the purpose of coercing the President of the United States to let it go. That is why it is put in. It will be argued that we must have money to run the Government. It is practically impossible to oppose an appropriation bill; and that is the reason it is placed here.

I cast no reflection upon anyone who differs from me on the general question of the propriety of placing general legislation on appropriation bills. Senators have voted as their judgments dictated. I am opposed to this provision upon principle. I am opposed to this kind of legislation. As I said yesterday, my attention has been called repeatedly to it for some years. I believe the safest course is to oppose it at all times, and I especially oppose it at this time, when I think I see from the statements made to me, from the admissions made upon the other side, that this is political in its character. That is the further reason why I oppose it.

Now, I submit this to Senators upon the other side who have conceded in the debate just had that an amendment of this kind ought not to be forced upon an appropriation bill. Here stands this minority. I am not authorized to speak for my party associates upon this question, but I do not believe that they favor this amendment. Did not the Democrats in the Committee on Appropriations oppose it? They did. Yet it was forced on them. Still, the Senator from Illinois says he was not aware of its political character. Yet he recollects that the Democratic governor did say that it was political; that is all. Oh, no; that is altogether too innocent, Mr. President. I prefer the bold, frank, manly statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], that it is political, and that that is the reason he favors it.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I shall vote to strike out this provision from the appropriation bill. It seems to me that every member of this body and the country at large are interested to oppose on all occasions such a pernicious system of legislation. It is calculated to take the Senate by surprise. No one expects in the body of a general appropriation bill to find political legislation or legislation affecting those general subjects which are distributed and put in charge of the committees which especially pertain to them.

I have had various occasions recently to observe the ill effects of this class of legislation. There is a case in my own State in which a feud has arisen about a little provision interjected into a river and harbor act establishing a criminal code and requiring mine owners and furnace men not to empty the slag of their mines into the rivers, a measure that ought to have been referred to the Judiciary Committee of this body, where it may be presumed it would have been handled with some technical and legal skill, and when debated would have attracted the attention of the Senators or Representatives from the States affected.

The widespread discontent with having one committee of this body to handle all of the appropriations grows largely out of the toleration of such legislation as this. The Senate is not left as a free body to deal with this proposed legislation. I shall not address myself to the political aspect of it nor to the merit of the question itself. It is obtruded here. It is where no Senator has a right to anticipate its presence. It comes without the consideration of the committee of this body which has been duly selected with reference to its ability and fitness to consider such a question.

The third clause of Rule XVI with reference to amendments to appropriation bills provides that—

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Suppose any Senator desires to amend this alien matter now in the body of the bill, he is not free as a Senator to offer that amendment here. Why? Not because the subject-matter ought not to be free to amendment; not because the subject-matter is not one which in our parliamentary scheme is intended to be first examined by a committee appointed with reference to it, and then to be open to any amendment or suggestion that any Senator may offer; but because of the fact that it has been isolated from its natural, its just, and systematic relation to our parliamentary proceedings and has been incrusted in the body of an appropriation bill, where no one can get at it.

Mr. President, is it not calculated to bring contempt and derision upon our rules to establish a system of parliamentary procedure which advertises to the whole world and notifies every Senator as to what are his rights and what are the rights of his constituents, and then openly, flagrantly, in protest of the minority, who have only the rules for their protection, to surprise them by putting this manner of legislation in an appropriation bill?

We have just perceived the embarrassment and difficulty of such a process. Here in the pending appropriation bill a matter with reference to marshals and district attorneys, which belongs to the Department of Justice and to the Committee on the Judiciary, was brought bodily into and obtruded into this measure. What is the result? If the Judiciary Committee desires to exercise its functions, if the Senate desires the enlightenment which it has appointed that body to give it, the appropriation bill must be broken up and there must be two committees at the same time considering fragmentary portions of it.

I am very much in favor of the reform contemplated by the provision which has been incorporated in this bill respecting marshals and district attorneys. I believe that it is a crying evil of this country that the ministers of justice, who should be fair-minded and dispassionate, should have contingent compensation based upon the measure of zeal which they may exercise in the prosecution of offenses. It is calculated to scandalize, to degrade, to pervert the whole system of justice to have such a system of fees upon our statute book. But desirous as I am to strike it down, feeling in my own State and witnessing in the practice of the law the evils of that system, I was yet unwilling in the little time that could be given to it in the midst of the consideration of an appropriation bill to foist upon the country such ill-considered and such an inappropriate style of legislation.

It is not for me, Mr. President, to criticise the House of Representatives. As a legal and coordinate body of this Government, it is competent constitutionally for it to send us its legislation in any such shape as it may please to put it, and there are occasions, extraordinary ones, it is true, in which it is not only fitting but is right for a House to associate its appropriations with conditions which may prevent abuses. But the Senate has established its system for itself, and if the two bodies shall not work in harmony with each other, it is at least possible for the Senate to work in harmony with itself. We shall improve general legislation; we shall tend to the betterment of all our processes of procedure; it will be fairer for everyone who has the burden of representing a constituency here, if it be known that the Senate will adhere to its system and that when it considers appropriation bills it will not tolerate the interjection of general legislation into them.

There are two clauses of our rules which tie our hands, which shackle the Senate, which deprive every Senator of his free right to offer an amendment upon this floor to the clause of the appropriation bill under consideration:

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill be received.

The clause which has been inserted in this bill is obnoxious to both objections. It is general legislation; it is not germane or relevant to the subject-matter contained in the bill.

What is the bill? It is a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government. That is all it purports to be; that is all that under our rules it has a right to be; and I do not conceive that we could enter upon or enforce a more wholesome and just reform than to be true to ourselves and insist in our procedure upon the letter and spirit of the system which we have established.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall vote to strike out of the pending appropriation bill this provision in regard to the legislature of New Mexico meeting in May; but I think the criticisms which are made upon the placing of legislation upon appropriation bills are without just foundation in many respects.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] holds that it is a system objectionable in every respect, that it is a surprise to the Senate, that provisions are imported into bills which can not be stricken out because of the Senate rules. If that be so it is an objection to the rules which prevent such an amendment.

But the construction which the Senator from Virginia makes of the Senate rules is not a correct one. There is nothing in the rules which prevents the amendment of a portion of an appropriation bill which is itself general legislation. It is the introduction into the bill of a new provision which is general legislation.

Then, when you come to define general legislation it is almost impossible to tell what it means. Is it general in respect to the subject, or in what respect is it general legislation? It is very difficult to define it. But be it general or not, be the language of the rule definite or not, precisely the same influences which will pass the legislation in a separate bill will pass it in an appropriation bill or strike it out. It is substantively and individually just as much subject to examination as it would be in a separate bill. If the Committee on Appropriations undertakes to consider, without the action of any committee of this body, a provision and puts it in an appropriation bill, the evil is there in the practice of the committee and not in the fact that it is general legislation upon an appropriation bill. All the processes of the Senate are as applicable to a provision in an appropriation bill, of general legislation or special legislation, as the report of an individual committee.

So the report of an individual committee on a bill may be a surprise, and the vast number of bills upon the Calendar are placed there without any kind of information or knowledge of Senators not upon the committees from which they are reported until they are heard and discussed in this body. When you come to investigate these propositions they have no true relation to the subject.

The practice of intermixing many subjects upon an appropriation bill which are not pertinent or relative to the appropriation is certainly objectionable. It is objectionable because it brings into one simple subject, the appropriation of money, matters that are not connected with it and that all come at once to the consideration of the body. But the proposition that it is a surprise to the Senate, that it is not subject to examination, that there is something in the mere fact that it is a general appropriation bill, and that it is legislation which does not relate to appropriations, does not affect the processes by which it is considered. They are the same precisely as if the special measure had been reported by a committee.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator were chairman of the Committee on Territories, would he not be surprised to find in a general appropriation bill a proposed enactment with reference to the Territories which had never been referred to his committee?

Mr. CALL. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. That was my argument, which the Senator is now answering.

Mr. CALL. That was not the Senator's argument—I beg his pardon.

Mr. DANIEL. That is the way I understood it. Perhaps the Senator may have understood it otherwise.

Mr. CALL. I will point out to the Senator wherein it was not his argument. The Senator said that this would be a surprise to the Senate, not to a member of the committee. Here is the difference. It would be a surprise to other Senators——

Mr. DANIEL. I am surprised that I know so little as to what would surprise the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CALL. The Senator of course knows a great deal, but that is not answering the argument. The Senator is here to make propositions and have them answered, and if they are not correctly answered, point it out. What the Senator from Florida knows or does not know, what the Senator from Virginia knows or does not know, is not the question. The question is whether, when upon an appropriation bill a subject of general legislation is placed of necessity, because it was on an appropriation bill, under the rules of the Senate, it was a surprise to Senators. I say that as to that proposition if I had been chairman of the Committee on Territories, and if I had reported a bill fixing the time for the meeting of the legislature of New Mexico in May, it would have been as much a surprise to every Senator not upon that committee as would be this provision upon the appropriation bill; and so of every other bill. Therefore the criticism that the placing of general legislation upon appropriation bills is a matter of surprise to other Senators is no more applicable to that species of legislation than it is to the report of any committee of this body on any bill before it.

There is an objection to this mode of legislating. That objection is that the Executive is compelled to choose between vetoing an appropriation bill or permitting the passage of some objectionable provision. It is a substantial objection that the President may be compelled either to veto the whole bill, disapprove it, or allow some objectionable provision to pass. But I am not concerned, for one, about that. If that were the only objection to putting such a provision upon an appropriation bill I should not object to it. The Executive power, voting two-thirds of the legislative power here, or exercising it, the power of the people, sub judice, as it were—the Executive power of two-thirds, less 1 vote, by which the power of legislation can be defeated—does not need any additional guard and assistance or protection from the other third of the legislative power that is vested in these two Houses. So that to me would be no kind of an objection.

It is a good rule that we should not have general legislation upon an appropriation bill, but you must not settle upon that rule all the objectionable practices of evil which result from careless legislation. It is objectionable because it collects in one single bill many subjects of importance which ought to have separate consideration and greater time given to them. But I have heard constantly in the seventeen years of my service here that legislation at every session of Congress has been forced upon appropriation bills because of the exigencies of the public service and the delays of legislation. We have had perpetual discussion of the necessary evils of legislating on an appropriation bill.

I think we had much better address ourselves to the amendment of the rules so that when general legislation is placed upon an appropriation bill it may be considered, and that any Senator may require it to be considered, with deliberation, and that it shall have been referred to the appropriate committee of this body before it goes upon the bill. If the Senator from Virginia or the Senator from New York desires to amend the rules in the interest of deliberate and careful and just legislation, let there be a rule adopted that will require the Committee on Appropriations, or any committee that is charged with appropriations, before putting general legislation upon a bill to have it referred to such committee of this body as properly has jurisdiction over the subject. That is the remedy, and not the proposition that the legislation is necessarily careless, indifferent, objectionable, and a surprise because it is put upon an appropriation bill and not brought in on another bill.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, this amendment about which so much has been said as being in the direction of general legislation and a defeat of rights is simply a provision in the appropriation for the expenses of the Territory of New Mexico changing the time of the meeting of the legislature from December to May. There is no constitutional question, there is no question affecting anybody's right, involved in this amendment. The Delegate from New Mexico is authority for the statement that it suits his people better to have the legislature hold its sessions in May than in December. Who is authorized to speak for the Territory of New Mexico better than the Delegate who represents the people and who was elected by the people? He surely understands, with all due respect to the Senator from New York, the wishes of his constituents better than the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. For how many years has that Territory suffered under the same difficulty of meeting in December?

Mr. ELKINS. I do not know. That is not pertinent to this discussion.

Mr. HILL. And why the suddenness of this change now?

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator from New York challenges my interfering on this subject or making myself busy. I had never read this provision when he made his motion to strike it out. I sent for the Delegate from New Mexico to come and explain it, and I asked the Delegate if it was political in its character, and he said no. I notice that the distinguished Senator from New York made reflections upon the Senator from Montana about the good taste of attacking the secretary of the Territory. I do not think the Senator is authorized to talk about good taste when he can get up here in his place and charge that the House of Representatives sneaks an amendment into the law and that the Committee on Appropriations concurred in sneaking it through. I do not believe a Senator capable of making that statement is a good authority and should be trusted upon the subject of taste.

Mr. President, there has been dragged into this discussion a political feature. I do not see the politics in it. I stated at once frankly just what the Delegate said to me, that it suited his people better, and the provision is entirely immaterial. As I said, it enunciates no principle; it violates no principle; it affects no constitutional right. The people, through their Delegate, simply ask that the legislature shall meet in May instead of December.

Mr. BRICE. Before the Senator from West Virginia takes his seat, I would ask him if he has at any time represented the Territory of New Mexico as a Delegate in Congress?

Mr. ELKINS. Oh, yes; I had that honor.

Mr. BRICE. Did the Senator when he was Delegate believe that his constituents wanted the time of the meeting of the legislature changed? If so, why did he not initiate the legislation at that time?

Mr. ELKINS. The question never came up. If they had asked me, I surely should have moved this amendment. I do not think that that has anything to do with the discussion.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I should not have engaged in this discussion but for the fact that, being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I feel, after the developments which have taken place with reference to the provisions of the bill, that I have myself perhaps been somewhat derelict in not having ascertained the motives and purpose and intention of the insertion of this clause in the appropriation bill.

I will state that, not being on the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having charge of the pending bill, I did not hear any of the statements made by the governor of New Mexico in reference to this subject to the effect that the provision was in itself and in character political, and that that was the object and purpose of its insertion. Had I understood that any such view was entertained by the governor of the Territory, I should have investigated the subject before voting in favor of retaining the provision; but not having learned it or heard any suspicion of it until after the bill was reported, it remains only for me to state my views in reference to the clause as it now appears in the bill.

There has been but one argument made that at all would justify the insertion of a clause for a change of the time of the meeting of the legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and that was made by the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]. He said that the meeting in December does not allow sufficient opportunity, first, to take the evidence, and, secondly, to determine the question as to contests before the adjournment of the legislature.

It is true that for a long number of years that objection has never been heard of and has never been brought to the attention of Congress, and yet I will say to the Senator that perhaps there is some justification in the suggestion he made that between the election in November and the meeting of the legislature in December sufficient time is not given to take evidence upon the question of contested elections. But, sir, that is no argument in favor of this provision. Why has not the Delegate from that Territory suggested that the legislature should meet, as the State legislatures do, in January? I hardly know a single legislature elected in November that does not convene in general assembly the following January for the purpose of transacting the legislative business of the State. Certainly it can not be claimed that the time required in New Mexico is greater than the time required in all the States of the Union to meet and properly and fairly examine into the question of contested elections. Therefore that argument is overthrown by the experience of all the States of the Union and by the past experience of the Territory itself.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit an interruption?

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course.

Mr. CARTER. I will state that in 1884 the legislature of New Mexico was authorized by Congress to fix a date for the meeting of the legislative assembly of the Territory. It fixed the last Monday in December, and it has been steadily held in the Territory by all authorities since then that, having exhausted the authority by a single act, the Territorial legislature is now without authority to change or modify the condition brought about by that designation.

Mr. FAULKNER. I agree with the Senator from Montana fully as to the law of the case. But the legislature and the people of New Mexico stated that that was not a satisfactory time. As I was proceeding to state, that was done in 1885. Since that time, although they exhausted the power conferred upon the legislative body by that act of Congress, they could have applied at any time to Congress to be given authority to change the time or to have had it changed by an act of Congress. But now for the first time during the whole period we find a proposition made to change the date of the meeting as fixed by the legislative assembly, not by Congress, as is done in almost every Territory of the Union, but fixed by the people of that Territory in the legislative bodies assembled. They fixed the period as the last Monday in December, and yet, without any petition, without any application except from the Delegate of the Territory, we find that for the first time the Delegate asks that it be changed to May.

Mr. President, there is a controversy between the Delegate and the governor as to whether May is a proper time. There is a statement from the personal knowledge of the distinguished Senator from Montana that neither February nor March nor April, perhaps, would be a proper time. Then we have the month of January. There is no dispute as to that being a time when it would be convenient for the people of the Territory of New Mexico to assemble the members of their legislature for the purpose of transacting legislative business.

But we find that January will not suit, and why? Mr. President, the scheme and the purpose of this provision in the House bill are just as plain to my mind as anything possibly can be. It is the duty of the secretary of the Territory to determine as to who are the members elected in that Territory. The body that will assemble next in that Territory will be elected in November. It meets in December. The present secretary of the Territory is a Democrat and the governor is a Democrat. Now, it will not do to extend the time to January in order to meet the demands of the Senator from Montana in reference to the time needed for contests. It will not do to fix upon February or March as the time to meet, because of the difficulties in sheep-shearing just at that particular season, when the people of that Territory are occupied in that industry; but we must fix a time when, taking in all the probabilities and the anticipations and the hopes and the expectations of our Republican friends we shall have inaugurated a Republican President, who will appoint a Republican governor, and a Republican secretary of the Territory, and then organize the legislature in May following.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Do I understand the Senator from West Virginia to say that the probabilities are that there will be a Republican President inaugurated next spring?

Mr. FAULKNER. No, sir; I have not yet lost my balance so far as to make such an unwise prediction.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understood the Senator to make that statement.

Mr. FAULKNER. I said that was the hope, the anticipation, and the expectation of our Republican friends, and especially, I may say, those who have very vivid imaginations and who dream when they are waking.

Mr. President, that is the whole purpose of this provision. If gentlemen desire to meet it fairly and squarely and honestly in a nonpartisan spirit and want more time for arranging and obtaining evidence of contests in the election of members of the legislature, let them offer an amendment to the bill fixing the period for meeting on the second Monday in January. That would test the sincerity of those gentlemen and disclose whether their motives and purpose and intention are political, or whether they desire to afford accommodation and convenience to the people of that Territory.

I sincerely hope that the amendment of the Senator from New York will be agreed to. Personally I am so bitterly opposed to allowing political provisions upon appropriation bills that I would not have any hesitation in staying here and making a contest upon this question just as long as we could get the members of the Senate who are opposed to political provisions on appropriation bills to stay here and make the contest.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I want to contribute only one word to this discussion. I do not know how far this provision may be political and how far it may not be, but I know that when I was chairman of the Committee on Territories, and before the present secretary of the Territory was appointed, I received several letters from people in New Mexico asking me to see to it that the time of holding the legislature was changed. I do not know whether any bill was introduced or not. The matter perhaps never took sufficient shape to bring it to an issue, but I remember distinctly that I had letters of that kind from different residents of New Mexico complaining of the time when the legislature was held.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I desire to say in this connection that I am a member of the Committee on Territories, of which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who has just taken his seat, is a member, and of which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] is also a member, as well as the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. These matters came up in the committee. Without specially stating what occurred there, I may say there were letters received upon this very question in regard to the date, and that such as I received, and such as I have read since, were favorable to the view taken by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], and given at length in his to-day's speech, and which facts I will not restate.

In that committee, of which we are members, we have had a bill presented for our consideration asking that Statehood be given to the Territory of New Mexico. All the time required by that bill was given, and for one I heard no contest in the committee in regard to any difference of date. They seemed to agree there without dissent upon a time for submitting the constitution, and a date is named in the bill and is not earlier than the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1896. That bill was reported favorably to this Senate and is now here, and I think if we could get a vote upon it and pass the bill giving Statehood to this Territory it would relieve this question, because it is not amenable to the criticism justly made against the clause sought to be stricken from this appropriation bill.

But, Mr. President, it is extremely doubtful if this can be done, and now it is thought best by certain persons, who speak for a certain political party in that Territory, that they shall put some provision in an appropriation bill that will change the time. I will not go over the reasons for that; they have all been given by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]; and they are certainly very pertinent and quite conclusive, and strike me with much force.

I oppose the provision and will vote against it, first, upon the ground that it is vicious legislation, out of time and place; improper legislation, because it is upon a general appropriation bill, and that it is general legislation. In the second place, I shall do so because it is a very material character of legislation, far-reaching and hurtful in results. It affects directly the rights of the whole people in that Territory and indirectly the whole country, as in the election it may give the balance of power to a party, and for the further reason that it has not been submitted to the proper committee—it being Territorial legislation, should have been passed upon by the Committee on Territories of this Senate. Dates are sometimes material, and in this instance it goes to the essence of the law proposed to be thus put through. Then, again, I object to it because it certainly smacks of party politics, to say nothing more, and can not properly belong to an appropriation bill. With the explanation which has been given as to the dates and the reasons therefor by the Senator who has just taken his seat, it must strike the mind of every reasonable man that party politics are in it, and wherever there are party politics in legislation upon an appropriation bill it is vicious. You know, Mr. President, and we know, that perhaps the most vicious legislation, and that which has been most unfortunate to our country, has been legislation under cover of appropriation bills; and whether you say this has been "sneaked in" or not, it certainly has come in at the back door without knocking and untimely. Legislation which has been thus accomplished is dangerous and not creditable to the body that permits it. For these reasons I shall vote to strike this provision from this appropriation bill.

I regret, sir, that this matter was not before the committee of which I am a member, and where such matters have been discussed and ought to be discussed; I mean the Committee on Territories, of which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who seeks to avoid responsibility for it, is also a member. Had it gone first to that committee, we could possibly have agreed upon a time or date; but it seems to be necessary to effect some hidden object. There must be a cat in the meal. It must be to effect some object not expressed in the language used that it should come to the Senate from the House in an appropriation bill, as if to avoid the scrutiny of the Committee on Territories. I take that view of it, sir, and under that impression I shall certainly vote against retaining the provision in the bill. There should be no party politics in an appropriation bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, my regard for the judicial temperament of the Senator from West Virginia, who is so fair and just in his actions and expressions on this floor, constrains me to reply to two suggestions made in the course of his observations. First, as a reason why this legislation should not now obtain in the form in which it is presented, the lapse of time fixing the last Monday of December for the next meeting of the legislature is urged as an estoppel. The statute of limitations is thereby pleaded. Every Senator will recall the fact that the numerous amendments to the Federal Constitution in and of themselves offer a sufficient answer to the argument of the Senator in that behalf. The convention, composed of the most thoughtful, patriotic, and farseeing men the world has ever known to meet and discuss matters in convention, failed to provide for all necessities and contingencies, and their experience demonstrates the limitations of all deliberative bodies.

From 1884 up to the present time no occasion has risen until recent date to disclose the vicious and unfortunate possibilities existing under an infirm law now upon the statute book relating to New Mexico. It is a mathematical problem merely. My previous statement of time, I am advised by the Delegate from New Mexico, was incomplete in so far as it relates to the proecss of contest. The elections are generally held from the 1st to the 10th of November.

Now mark, calculate, and conclude as to the necessity for this provision. First, the returns must be filed with the secretary of the Territory within fifteen days. After the return of the notice there are thirty days in which to file a contest and eight days in which to file an answer; then thirty days in which to give notice of an intention to take testimony. Sixty days are then given in which to reduce the testimony to form for presentation to the legislature, making an aggregate of one hundred and forty-three days after the election before the contest is in form for presentation to the legislature. This will run the proceeding into the month of April under the laws of that Territory.

So the provision to contest is rendered absolutely nugatory because of the fact that the legislature may, under existing law, refuse to consider until the record is complete, and its term will expire by limitation before the resisting party can be brought to final issue.

It does seem to me under these circumstances that the answer is complete in so far as it refers to the question of the Senator from West Virginia drawing upon the month of January as a proper and a fitting time. The same difficulties sought to be remedied by fixing the month of May would obtain if the month of January instead of the month of December should be named. The obvious fact remains that the contest record would not be complete until after the session of the legislature had expired by limitation.

This, then, brings us back to the apparent political point connected with this transaction. No one can predict the complexion of the Territorial legislature of New Mexico to be elected at the next general election. Hence the law can not affect an officer now holding the office. If, however, it has appeared to the judgment of the Delegate from New Mexico, who speaks for the majority of the electors of that Territory, that the present incumbent of the secretary's office at the time of the assembling of the last legislature so far disregarded his duties under the law and his oath as to deprive citizens of that Territory of lawful representation under the supreme rule of the majority, it is the plain duty of Congress to deprive him of the privilege of inflicting that injustice in the future. If it be political to prevent a single appointee of the President of the United States from exercising the arrogated privilege of disfranchising any district in the Territory of New Mexico, then we should indulge in such politics. Let the supreme rule of the majority obtain. To allow the Territorial secretary to set at naught the voice of the majority of the people of New Mexico will be of little advantage to any party, and a great and an irreparable wrong to the people.

Mr. FAULKNER. In reply to the Senator as to his statement of the peculiar law of contest in that Territory, I desire to say that if the contestant does not give notice that he intends to make the contest before the end of the thirty days provided for, then it would be impossible even to get the notice of contest completed under the law, as he gives it, by the 1st day of May.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; it would be in the early part of April.

Mr. FAULKNER. It would be just about the 1st day of May if he waited until the end of the thirty days, as the Senator will see if he makes the calculation.

But I call the Senator's particular attention to a bill in considering which at the present session the Committee on Territories of the Senate has passed upon this question. Is it not remarkable that in reporting that bill the committee provide that the legislature of the Territory to be admitted into the Union shall convene on the third Monday of December following the vote and the proclamation by the President admitting the State as one of the members of this Union?

Is it not remarkable, if there be so much difficulty and so much trouble and inconvenience to the citizens of New Mexico, that their intelligent and active and energetic Delegate should have stood by and seen this great bill, admitting that Territory as one of the States of the Union, introduced into the Senate, passed through a committee of the Senate, and reported back to the Senate, providing that the representatives of those people when admitted as a State into the Union for the first time shall convene on the third Monday of December?

Mr. CARTER. I wish to interrupt the Senator from West Virginia, with his permission. I apprehend that some misunderstanding exists concerning the fixing of the date as suggested, and for this reason: In the regular course of procedure for the admission of a State into the Union authority is given the President of the United States to cause to be examined the constitution adopted by the people and presented to him for examination. If satisfied that such constitution presents a scheme of government republican in form, he thereupon issues his proclamation admitting the State into the Union.

It is left to the governor and the properly constituted authorities of the State, as a rule, to fix the time and place for the meeting of the legislature. That was the case in Utah and with reference to all the States recently admitted. If such a provision as the Senator describes has crept into the bill or any print of the bill for the admission of New Mexico, it would of necessity have to be amended in the Senate or in the other House, for the obvious reason that the Senate and the House of Representatives can not predict just when the President would issue the proclamation. His proclamation might be issued long after the time fixed in the act for the meeting of the legislature.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Montana will find that he is mistaken with reference to Utah. I do not know how it was as to other Territories. That bill designated when the legislature should convene for the first time as a State legislature, and it fixed the time. I understand the New Mexico bill fixes it distinctly, by saying that the legislature shall convene at the time now provided by law, which of course would be on the third Monday in December.

It strikes me as very remarkable that with this matter now assuming such important form, as affecting the inconvenience of the people of New Mexico, the measure to which I refer has been allowed to go through the Senate of the United States so as to reach its Calendar without even a suggestion of a change of the time when the legislature shall meet in order to accommodate the convenience of the people of the Territory. This is simply an additional reason which demonstrates the correctness of the views which I first expressed.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I find in the Statutes at Large, volume 20, page 193, that in the legislative appropriation act of 1878 there are two long sections providing for a government in the Territories. I will ask that those two sections be inserted in my remarks to show how important and material they were:

That from and after the adjournment of the next session of the several Territorial legislatures the council of each of the Territories of the United States shall not exceed 12 members and the house of representatives of each shall not exceed 24 members, and the members of each branch of the said several legislatures shall receive a compensation of $4 per day each during the sessions provided by law, and shall receive such mileage as the law provides: and the president of the council and the speaker of the house of representatives shall each receive $6 per day for the same time. And the several legislatures at their next sessions are directed to divide their respective Territories into as many council and representative districts as they desire, which districts shall be as nearly equal as practicable, taking into consideration population except Indians not taxed: Provided, That the number of council districts shall not exceed 12 and the representative districts shall not exceed 24 in any one of said Territories, and all parts of sections 1847, 1849, 1853, and 1922 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in conflict with the provisions herein are repealed.

That the subordinate officers of each branch of said Territorial legislatures shall consist of one chief clerk, who shall receive a compensation of $6 per day; one enrolling and engrossing clerk, at $5 per day; sergeant-at-arms and doorkeeper, at $5 per day; one messenger and watchman, at $4 per day each; and one chaplain, at $1.50 per day. Said sums shall be paid only during the sessions of said legislatures; and no greater number of officers or charges per diem shall be paid or allowed by the United States to any Territory. And section 1861 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed, and this substituted in lieu thereof: Provided, That for the performance of all official duties imposed by the Territorial legislatures, and not provided for in the organic act, the secretaries of the Territories respectively shall be allowed such fees as may be fixed by the Territorial legislatures. And in no case shall the expenditure for public printing in any of the Territories exceed the sum of $2,500 for any one year.

As distinguished from this provision, I will read a part of one section:

That from and after the adjournment of the next session of the several Territorial legislatures the council of each of the Territories of the United States shall not exceed 12 members and the House of Representatives of each shall not exceed 24 members, and the members of each branch of the said several legislatures shall receive a compensation of $4 per day each during the sessions provided by law, and shall receive such mileage as the law provides.

There was a radical revision of the law on the subject of Territories in the legislative and judicial act, and I do not know that there were any particular objections raised even to that sort of legislation, which is radical.

Here is a mere attempt to change the date for reasons represented by the Delegate from the Territory to be good and sufficient for his people. It has been the custom of Congress to legislate about Territories whenever it pleased. Congress has sole and exclusive jurisdiction over everything in a Territory, and if it has wanted to pass a law affecting Territories in an appropriation bill, it has done so. Any time and any place have seemed suitable in the discretion of Congress to pass legislation affecting the Territories.

If such legislation as I have referred to, found in the Statutes at Large, has been placed in an appropriation act, why all this objection simply to changing the date? The political significance or the political feature of the amendment which was made by the House of Representatives has been drawn into the debate by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER]. I answered promptly that it had no political significance, upon the authority of the Delegate from New Mexico.

I take it that my colleague has examined, as I have, the bill for the admission of New Mexico into the Union as a State, reported by the chairman of the Territorial Committee. There is in it no such provision as he states as to the meeting of the legislature.

Mr. FAULKNER. If my colleague will permit me——

Mr. ELKINS. I simply state that to correct a misapprehension. I know my colleague has not the bill before him.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have it before me, and I therefore want to ask the Senator to read anything in the bill which corrects my statement. He says he has the bill before him and that it corrects my statement.

Mr. ELKINS. I have the bill before me, but I did not observe the provision when I read the bill just now.

Section 19, which is the section that is pertinent, says:

That the constitutional convention may by ordinance provide for the election of officers for a full State government, including members of the legislature and Representative in Congress, at the time for the election for the ratification or rejection of the constitution; but the State government shall remain in abeyance until the State shall be admitted into the Union as proposed by this act, etc.

That is, by Presidential proclamation. Suppose the proclamation——

Mr. FAULKNER. If my colleague will permit me, like all lawyers he reads one side, and the most remarkable fact about reading one side is that he has stopped just where the express provision is made, which follows the very last word he read, designating when the legislature shall meet.

Mr. ELKINS. I will read the whole section for the information of the Senate. I did not want to take up the time, as I supposed the Senate wanted to vote on the motion.

In case the constitution of said State shall be ratified by the people, but not otherwise, the legislature thereof may assemble, organize, and elect two Senators of the United States in the manner now prescribed by the laws of the United States; and the governor and secretary of state of the proposed State shall certify the election of the Senators and Representative in the manner required by law, and when such State is admitted into the Union, as provided in this act, the Senators and Representative shall be entitled to be admitted to seats in Congress and to all rights and privileges of Senators and Representatives of other States in the Congress of the United States.

Does my colleague wish me to read further? That refers to the election of United States Senators under the law of the United States. I do not see what it has to do with the matter. I supposed there was something in my colleague's interruption. I had not read the bill carefully. I had only read a few lines, glancing over it hastily, and I was ready to be corrected, and I hope my colleague will stand ready to be corrected.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think the Senator is corrected by reading the statute.

Mr. ELKINS. We differ, as we do sometimes on other questions.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I rise only for the purpose of saying that the Senate seems to have turned into an experience meeting, and we are regaled here this afternoon by Democrats and by Republicans on the subject of the administration of the laws of Territories. About the only thing that appears to be in dispute is as to whether the Democratic secretary in the Territory of New Mexico shall conduct the affairs of his office upon the principles and precedents that have been set him by his Republican predecessors. If current history is to be believed, the Republican secretaries in the Territory of New Mexico have been in the habit, to some extent at least, from time to time, of placing upon the legislative rolls of that Territory Republicans who were not elected to offices which they claimed or where the offices were seriously in dispute.

Now, the Administration changes from a Republican to a Democratic Administration; a Democratic secretary of the Territory is appointed, and he seeks naturally to change the political complexion of the legislature of the Territory. Following the precedent of his illustrious predecessors, according to the statement of Senators made in this Chamber, he has placed upon the legislative rolls as elected to the different branches of the legislature gentlemen who were not elected or whose election is at least questionable. Under such circumstances it is very difficult to tell what course the Populists should pursue. Here is a confession of corruption on both sides; or, at least, no denial of the charge that the secretary of that Territory has been manipulating the returns of elections. So far as I know there has never been any denial of the charge of like conduct upon the part of his predecessors.

I infer, then, from this condition of affairs, and especially from some charges which have been made recently by my illustrious friend the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], who I regret is not in his seat to-day, that the claim of pure statesmanship and purity in elections made by the respective great political parties, as they are termed here, the Republican and the Democratic parties, is not altogether sincere.

Mr. President, it is a very sad spectacle indeed, it is humiliating to the ordinary American citizen, to say nothing about the ordinary American statesman, to witness this grave confession in the United States Senate that frauds of such a character are being practiced in one of the most important Territories in the Union. The only reason why complaint is now made upon the other side of the Chamber is that their men, who have practiced those frauds, have been turned out and the Democrat who has been longing for many years for accession to power has finally come into power in that Territory and is following Republican precedent.

I am inclined to believe that so far as I am concerned I will vote with my Democratic friends here, not because I approve their methods, but it is quite evident to me that the time is coming, and coming with great rapidity—it will be here, Mr. President, before we realize it—when our Democratic friends will be turned out of power in this country to browse as best they can, probably for the next third of a century. I think they will probably get no more than they are entitled to, considering the relation which exists in that Territory between the respective parties, by being held in power for the next eight or nine months.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] will prevail and that this provision will be stricken out. I think it is political and that the political objects to be attained by it are, first, to deprive the Territorial secretary of the power to organize the legislature and to place it in the hands of a Republican secretary. That would appear to most persons to be a decided party advantage. It is not such an advantage as should be legislated into an appropriation bill by Congress in regard to any of the Territories of this Union. The law now existing in the Territory, if I am not misinformed, was passed by a Republican Territorial general assembly or legislature, and Republican secretaries of the Territory have enforced and administered the law just as the present Democratic secretary has administered and enforced it, and if I am not misinformed the action of the present secretary of the Territory has been sustained by the courts.

The next objection to the provision is one which relates to the convenience of the people. I refer to the time for meeting, in May instead of in December or, as would be better, in January or February. I have no doubt that it would suit an overwhelming majority of the people of the Territory of New Mexico to have their legislative assembly meet in January, and not in December. I think it would be greatly to their inconvenience to meet in May. Why do I object to their meeting in May? Aside from the one political reason which I have given, I will recite another. I call the attention of Republican Senators to this fact. I understand the fiscal year of the Territory ends on March 1, and there is no provision made for paying the Territorial officers or supporting the Territorial institutions from the close of the fiscal year, March 1, 1897, until May, 1897. What are you going to do with your Territorial government, with not a dollar to maintain the Territorial administration from the 1st of March until the time proposed for the legislature to meet? Is that right? Is it just? Is it what the people of the Territory want? There is the dilemma.

In the next place, meeting in May will be the most inconvenient season for the people of New Mexico. Why? Because that Territory ranks fourth in size in the Union in the number of sheep and in the sheep-growing industry, and many of the members of the legislature to be elected and who have been elected and will be elected again are engaged in that business, and they would be busy at that particular season of the year in shearing and lambing. The cattlemen would also be engaged in rounding up their stock and the ranchmen in cultivating their crops. Here are two substantial reasons why this provision should not prevail which are not based upon political grounds. One very serious embarrassment in that Territory will be in consequence of the expiration of the Territorial fiscal year on the 1st of March, while the legislature will not meet until May, there being no appropriation for the support of the Territorial government for the period between the 1st of March and the meeting in May.

I have given one statement of the political feature of this matter, but I will go on about the expenses of the Territory, which is a more important matter. Now, mark you, the legislature is to meet in May, according to this provision. The appropriation provides for the payment of the expenses of the legislature—this appropriation itself, remember now—the printing of the journal and the laws thereof. If the legislature does not meet until May, it can not close until along in June. This is a bill for the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending 1897. That fiscal year expires on the 30th of June, 1897. This appropriation for the Territorial legislature is made, and the legislature meets in May, and it can not close until some time in June as a matter of course.

I call the attention of Senators on the other side to the fact that the legislature can not dispose of its business in less than six, eight, or ten weeks. It will take until the last of June. It would be impossible for the legislature to have the journals and the laws printed and for the disbursing officers to close up their accounts by the end of June for the work done during the session. It could not be done. The money appropriated would be covered back into the Treasury before the work could be completed. How are you going to obviate this difficulty? Here is the condition you have to confront. This appropriation is for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1897, and it is for all the expenses of the legislature to meet in May, 1897, and that legislature meeting in May can not complete its work and do what the money appropriated for it contemplates by the time the money will have to be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. President, those reasons, I think, are amply sufficient to cause our Republican friends to change the date of the meeting at least until January or February, not later than the second Monday in February. The first or second Monday in January would suit much better. It would be in consonance with nearly all the other legislative assemblies in the United States, which nearly all meet on the first Monday in January, and it would be only right and fair.

But here is another political reason, and I call the attention of my Republican friends to it. They certainly do not want to attempt to take any political advantage by a provision in an appropriation bill. Under the Territorial laws of New Mexico, as they exist to-day, all the Territorial officers who have been confirmed by the last legislature, and they are Democratic and were the successors to the Republicans, hold their offices for two years, until their successors have been appointed and have qualified. Under the same law the Republican Territorial officials continued in office until January, 1895, nearly two years after the Democratic administration came in, and until the last legislature met and made other provision. The officials who will be appointed and confirmed by the legislature that is to be held in December and January next will hold for two years, notwithstanding a Republican President may possibly be elected and a Republican governor appointed for the Territory.

Here is the politics in it. The Republicans hope to elect a President. They want the Republican President to appoint a Republican governor, and then they want the legislature to meet after that date and turn out the Democratic Territorial officials after the expiration of only a little over a year. Is this right and fair? Is it honorable and just that a great political party, branded G. O. P., should want to seek such a little political advantage? No, Mr. President, it is not.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. Unless it is pretty certain that the Republican party is going to elect its candidate for President and get the governor of New Mexico there is no political advantage in this provision.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; there is.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The intention is political.

Mr. COCKRELL. The intention is political, necessarily so. There you see it upon its face. There are two political reasons. You can not deny them. They stand out in bold relief. They are advantages attempted to be taken by a great political party of its opponents by legislation in an appropriation bill. It is not right; it is not just.

There are these two substantial reasons why the time should not be changed to May. They arise first from the Territorial legislative law. The fiscal year of the Territory ending on March 1, 1897, there will then be no provision made for the expenses of the Territorial government until May, 1897, and until the Territorial legislative assembly can make provision. Is that right? Then, again, look at the inconvenience of it. The legislation in the pending bill appropriating money requires the legislature to meet in May, and the year for which the money is appropriated expires on the 30th of June. The legislature can not dispose of its business in a satisfactory manner before the money appropriated to defray the expenses of it will be covered into the Treasury, and you will be in this dilemma.

Unless Senators will agree to a modification as to the time, I insist that the provision shall be stricken out.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the motion will not be pressed until the appropriation bill is disposed of.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am sorry——

Mr. CULLOM. I am very anxious that the bill shall be disposed of this evening, and I hope the motion will not be pressed until the bill is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado withdraw the motion?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not withdraw the motion, but I express my deep regret that I have interfered with the plan of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I know the Senator from Colorado did not mean to do so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I certainly did not.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion until the bill is disposed of, when I will join with him in favor of the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. CULLOM. I must ask the Senate to dispose of the bill to-night.

Mr. PLATT. Can we not have a vote on the pending amendment?

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the yeas and nays may be called on this question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], to strike out the clause which has been read.

Mr. GORMAN. What becomes of the motion to adjourn over?

Mr. VILAS. Was there an announcement of the decision on the motion to adjourn over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair announced the fact that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. CULLOM. I was calling for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not so understand. The question will be treated as still being open.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senate will reconsider the vote and that it will let us see whether we can not come to an agreement about this matter so as to dispose of the bill to-night. I do not myself desire a session to-morrow, but I am very anxious to get the appropriation bill out of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Illinois has the power to get a vote at any time he chooses. The amendment has been discussed very largely on both sides of the Senate. If the Senator will move to lay the amendment on the table he can get a vote.

Mr. FRYE (to Mr. CULLOM). Why do you not do that?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator does not do that, I do not think we are bound to stay here on his account.

Mr. CULLOM. I will try that course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois demand the yeas and nays on the motion that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet Monday?

Mr. CULLOM. I think the Senator had better——

Mr. WOLCOTT. Do I understand that the Senator from Illinois moves to reconsider the vote?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. GORMAN. This is an important matter which is under consideration. It is the first time for the last fifteen years that a purely political question has been brought in on an appropriation bill. I say to the Senator that there ought to be and there will be fair time for the discussion of the matter.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I rise to a point of order. I do not understand that the good and fair time is pending a request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GORMAN. I am merely giving the reason why I think we should adjourn over to-morrow, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If objection is interposed——

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the Senator from Maryland may be allowed to make his statement, and then I wish to make one myself.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I beg pardon of the Senator from Maryland. I did not mean to interfere with him.

Mr. GORMAN. It is all right.

Mr. WOLCOTT. And I withdraw anything I can withdraw.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CARTER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. DANIEL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE]. Under the circumstances, I shall not vote.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. PLATT (when Mr. HAWLEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is detained from the Senate by indisposition. I presume he is paired with some Senator, although I am not sure. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has no pair, I will state.

Mr. PLATT. I trust, then, that the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] will see that a pair is arranged for him in some way.

Mr. DUBOIS. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] that he pair his colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. PLATT. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. DUBOIS. That will allow me to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. On this question I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS]. Judging this to be a political question, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. QUAY. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I am not advised as to how he would vote on this question, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and vote "yea."

Mr. TURPIE. I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I refrained from voting on the call of the roll. However, being advised that a quorum has not yet voted, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CAFFERY. I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON], who is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. I vote "yea."

Mr. GEAR. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. My pair having been transferred, I vote "nay."

Mr. DANIEL. It is suggested to me that I transfer my pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. He is not present. I make that transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to announce my pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. However, in order to make a quorum, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (after having voted in the negative). This provision seems to have taken something of a political turn, and I think I ought to withdraw my vote, as I stand paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who is absent.

Mr. CALL. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and vote "yea."

Mr. CARTER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] stands paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. We will transfer our pairs, so that both the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] and I can vote, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] will be paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. QUAY. To assist in producing a quorum I will take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCBRIDE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 12; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 572) for the relief of James Duke was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 2265) to provide for the reimbursement of the expenses of constructing a sewer upon the permanent reservation at Hot Springs, Ark., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 7170) to grant the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railroad Company the right to acquire depot grounds at the town of Davis, Tishomingo County, Chickasaw Nation, Ind. T., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. 7542) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HILL to strike out the proviso beginning in line 4, page 61.

Mr. CULLOM. If I may be allowed to make a motion, I move that the pending amendment, to strike out from the word "dollars," in line 4 on page 61, to and including line 16, be laid on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to lay the pending amendment on the table.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the question be stated so that we may understand it.

Mr. CULLOM. I will state it again. The Senator from New York moved to strike out beginning with the word "Provided," in line 4, page 61, to and including line 16, on the same page. I move to lay that amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator, before he makes that motion, permit me to say a word? Will he withdraw it for a second?

Mr. CULLOM. Of course.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator from Illinois will not move to lay the amendment on the table, but will let us have a perfectly fair vote on it in the Senate, after proper discussion, which would follow as a matter of course. If this course is not pursued, other amendments will be offered within the rule, and a fight will be inaugurated on an appropriation bill such as we have not had here for many years. I submit to the Senator in charge of the bill that it is not a fair way to treat this question. For the first time in the last ten or fifteen years purely a political matter is brought in upon an appropriation bill—legislation such as both parties have condemned. I trust that the Senate, on a fair vote, will strike out this provision. But at all events we are entitled to have, and we shall have, a fair discussion of the proposition, and it will extend away beyond the bounds which have been laid out at present.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me to say a word (both of us are out of order, except by unanimous consent), I will state that I thought making a motion to lay the amendment on the table would be a test of the sense of the Senate as to whether the Senate is in favor of retaining the provision in the bill or not, and if it is not in favor of retaining it, so far as I am concerned I should not feel like pursuing the matter any further.

Mr. GORMAN. Then, if it is to be merely a test vote and the Senator puts it that way, so far as I am concerned I am ready to vote now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to lay the pending amendment on the table.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we ought to have the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAFFERY (when Mr. BLANCHARD'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BLANCHARD] is absent on business. He has a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD].

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and vote "nay."

Mr. CARTER (when his name was called). Having a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON], I will withhold my vote.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. PLATT. I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that he transfer his pair, so that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] will stand paired with my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well; I will transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and I vote "nay."

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] and vote "nay."

Mr. MANTLE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but I have no doubt that in the present condition of the Senate he will excuse me for voting. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WALTHALL. I desire to announce that on this vote the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. GEAR. I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON], but that pair has been transferred by an arrangement with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], so that the Senator from Wisconsin and myself can vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PERKINS. As I have before announced, I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] and I vote "nay."

Mr. BATE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. Were my colleague here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. PROCTOR (after voting in the affirmative). I learn that before I came into the Chamber my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] was transferred to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. MANTLE. As I have already announced, I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I now transfer that pair to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] and vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON] as before to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and I vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (after having voted in the affirmative). Before the result is announced, I desire to withdraw my vote. I did not understand when I cast it that there was any political question involved.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Aldrich,	Carter,	McBride,	Platt,
Allison,	Cullom,	McMillan,	Shoup,
Baker,	Davis,	Mantle,	Teller.
Brown,	Elkins,	Mitchell, Oreg.

Hansbrough,	Morgan,	Sherman,

So the Senate refused to lay Mr. HILL's amendment on the table.

Mr. CULLOM. As the vote seems to indicate the sentiment of the Senate on this question, I shall make no further insistence upon retaining the provision in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], to strike out the proviso on page 61 of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest, on page 3, line 4, in the item for "assistant in the stationery room," to add, after "one thousand," the words "two hundred," and after the word "dollars," the words "while held by the present incumbent"; so as to read:

Assistant in stationery room, $1,200, while held by the present incumbent.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. When this bill was in Committee of the Whole there was an amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], who is now absent, upon which a point of order was made and which was ruled out. I have modified the amendment so that I think it is not open to a point of order and I will offer it again. It comes in on page 88, after line 16.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, cause the present contract for producing copies of the drawings of the weekly issues of patents for inventions, trade-mark certificates, drawings for the library editions of patents, for producing exhausted copies, and copies of pending applications, and of foreign patents or publications, and for producing the photolithographic work for the illustrated pages of the Official Gazette of the Patent Office, to be extended for the term of one year from the 1st day of July, 1896.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to make a statement in regard to this amendment. I made the point of order against the amendment as offered by the Senator from South Dakota. The amendment is now presented in a different shape, and until it took this shape I stated to my distinguished friend from Connecticut that I would not admit the amendment without making the point of order upon it unless the Senator from South Dakota himself asked it. He is not now present, however, and as we are about to conclude the consideration of the bill, I make no question as to the right of the Senator to offer the amendment.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to state in a few words the change which has been made in the amendment as originally offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PLATT. The amendment as formerly proposed would allow the Secretary of the Interior to extend for four years the contract which is made for these drawings. I think it ought to be extended for a year, and the amendment is now presented in that form.

Mr. CULLOM. The previous amendment extended it four years, and this is for one year.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUBOIS. After the word "dollars," in line 16, page 81, I move to add:

For ten examiners, to constitute a board of examiners of surveys, at $2,000 each, the appointment to be certified by the Civil Service Commission, $20,000.

I am very sorry that this matter was not brought to my attention sooner, in order that I might have gone before the Committee on Appropriations and urged it. It is for the appointment of examiners to examine surveyed lands in the West. These appointments are now made for political considerations, and we have had a great deal of trouble in that part of the country on account of it. Men who are inexperienced, who never have had an opportunity to visit that region, and who do not understand the surveys which have been made are sent out, and it makes great confusion. It ties up the contracts; months and months elapse before they can be finally settled.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. Lamoreux, most heartily and cordially supports this amendment. Being chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, and having a great deal of business with him, I can say that he is a most excellent officer. He understands the wants of the Western country remarkably well. He has the entire confidence of all of the Western Senators. He is very anxious for this amendment to prevail, and asked me to endeavor to induce the Senate to accept it.

The amendment will not impose any additional expense upon the Government. When we come to consider the sundry civil appropriation bill, which makes provision for these examiners, the $20,000 which is appropriated here can be taken out, so that there will be no additional cost to the Government.

These examiners will not be appointed until after they are certified by the Civil Service Commission. They will be practical men in the office as well as men who understand surveys. It will expedite the business, as Mr. Lamoreux says, very much, and it is an amendment which I believe all of the Western Senators agree with me in thinking will be of great advantage to our part of the country.

As I stated, it has the hearty cooperation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and I must apologize to the Committee on Appropriations for not going before them in regard to it, as I should have done had my attention been called to it sooner.

Mr. TELLER. I dislike to differ from the Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, but the Appropriations Committee had this question before it and fairly considered it. I have myself had a little experience in those matters, and I am satisfied that no benefit will be derived from the creation of a new division in the Land Office. I am willing to indorse everything that the Senator from Idaho has said about the present head of the Land Office, but I am certain that no good can come from the adoption of the amendment.

We have the special examiners of surveys, but unless they go into the field they know nothing whatever about the surveys. They can not tell, being located here, whether the surveys are properly made or not. We have always had a revision of the surveys in the Interior Department, and it was found some years ago that the surveyors were in the habit of sitting down in their offices and making the plats, without going into the field at all. The returns came to the office apparently perfect and complete, and there was nothing in the office to show otherwise, as there will be nothing for these 10 men when they are appointed by which they can determine whether the survey has ever been actually made or not. All they can do is to correct irregularities in the papers which come in.

The special inspectors who are sent out go into the field; they hunt for the corner posts or stakes which by law have been set, and if they do find them, while they do not survey, they go over enough of the ground to find whether the stakes have been properly set, and in some instances of course they run a trial line.

Mr. DUBOIS. I wish to state to the Senator from Colorado that special examiners, just the same, will be provided for in the sundry civil appropriation bill. There is now, I think, $45,000 appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. TELLER. The special examiners will of course go into the field. I can not conceive the slightest benefit to the public service that these 10 men can be in the office here. They can know nothing about the surveys any more than the present clerical force does which revises the plats which come in. All they can tell is whether the mechanical work of the plats has been properly made.

What we have suffered from in the West is a failure of the engineers to go upon the ground and set the corner stakes of the owners of land and make an actual survey, a failure that can never be determined by men in the Land Office here; it must be determined by men on the ground.

In my judgment, there are many better ways in which the Government can spend this money in the Western country than to spend it for a division here in the General Land Office.

Mr. DUBOIS. These 10 men will go into the field also. They can be sent into the field at any time. Besides that, there will be others whose duty is in the field all the time. The amendment does not propose to interfere at all with that feature.

Mr. TELLER. If we want any more inspectors in the field they should be applied for, but I know enough of the way business is done there to know that the moment these people are located here and this division created in the General Land Office they will simply remain here and we shall get no service in the field whatever.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to offer an amendment which I fear, if excepted to, is out of order, but I will ask the privilege of submitting a statement in respect to it from the Secretary of the Treasury. I desire to offer an amendment to come in on page 24, line 18, after the word "messengers" where it occurs the second time.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will make a brief statement I shall not make the point of order on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 18, after the word "messengers" where it last occurs, it is proposed to insert:

For watchman to care for the monument and wharf at Wakefield, Va., $300; the wharf to be used by the public under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed therefor by the Secretary of State.

Mr. CULLOM. I make no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask leave to have printed in support of the amendment a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 5, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication from the Secretary of State of the 4th instant, submitting an estimate of appropriation for the employment of a watchman, at a salary of $50 per month, to care for the monument being erected at the birthplace of Washington, Wakefield, Va., in pursuance of the joint resolution of Congress of February 26, 1881, and which will be completed in May of this year.

Respectfully, yours, S. WIKE, Acting Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 4, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose, with a view to its transmission to Congress, a copy of a letter from Col. John M. Wilson, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, dated the 29th ultimo, stating that the monument to be erected at the birthplace of Washington, Wakefield, Va., pursuant to the joint resolution of February 26, 1881 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 21, p. 519), will be completed in May next, and urging that a small appropriation for the employment of a watchman be granted.

I cordially indorse Colonel Wilson's recommendation, and trust that the sum of $50 per month may be allowed during the present session.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

RICHARD OLNEY.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
Washington, D. C., February 29, 1896.

Mr. SECRETARY: I have the honor to report that it is probable that the monument to be erected at the birthplace of Washington under your direction, in accordance with the joint resolution of February 26, 1881, will be completed in May, 1896.

I beg to invite attention to the necessity of the appointment of a watchman to care for this monument, and to suggest that Congress may be requested to make provision for such a custodian at a small salary.

The stone slab placed in position about the year 1813 to mark the site of Washington's birthplace was carried away piece by piece by vandals seeking mementos of the spot, and I fear similar attempts will be made upon the new monument, as frequent efforts are made to break off pieces from the Washington Monument in this city.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN M. WILSON,
Colonel Engineers, United States Army.

Hon. RICHARD OLNEY,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADJUSTMENT OF CLAIMS WITH ARKANSAS.

Mr. BERRY. I now ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to give notice that on Monday morning next, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 30, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 27, 1896.

CONSUL.

Frank W. Roberts, of Maine, to be consul of the United States at Cape Town, Cape Colony.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

George P. Decker, of New York, to be collector of customs for the district of Genesee, in the State of New York.

POSTMASTERS.

William A. Bucknam, to be postmaster at Truckee, in the county of Nevada and State of California.

Dora Austin, to be postmaster at Perris, in the county of Riverside and State of California.

Thomas H. Jackman, to be postmaster at Peabody, in the county of Essex and State of Massachusetts.

Stephen J. Lyon, to be postmaster at Collinsville, in the county of Hartfort and State of Connecticut.

George W. Merrill, to be postmaster at Orange, in the county of Franklin and State of Massachusetts.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IRRIGATION.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Printing, I submit the following report and ask for its present consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration Senate concurrent resolution to eliminate from 10,000 copies of the Report on the Statistics of Agriculture in the United States, Census of 1890, the monograph entitled "Report on agriculture by irrigation in the Western part of the United States," and bind the same as a separate document, with an appendix bringing the water-supply information up to date, recommend that the same be agreed to.

The Public Printer estimates that the cost of this work will be about $3,000.

This report is much sought after in the Western States experimenting in irrigation, and, properly indexed when brought down to date as proposed, can be made readily available at comparatively small cost.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection, and the resolution was agreed to.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

The bill (S. 1506) for the relief of Holmes & Leathers—to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions and bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 114) authorizing and directing Bernard R. Green to exercise the duties and powers heretofore conferred upon the late Gen. Thomas L. Casey in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress;

A bill (S. 2629) to provide for the erection of a public building at Washington, Pa.;

Joint resolution (S. R. 111) to authorize Benjamin Harrison to accept certain medals presented to him while President of the United States;

Joint resolution (S. R. 110) providing for the appointment of a commission under the direction of the Secretary of War for the preliminary survey, with plans, specifications, and approximate estimates of cost thereof, for the construction of a ship canal of approved width and depth from the lower shore of Lake Michigan to the Wabash River, and for the further investigation of the practicability of the construction of such waterway;

A bill (S. 2546) concerning the court of appeals in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 2346) to prescribe the times and places of holding the district court of the United States in and for the District of Alaska;

A bill (S. 676) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895;

Joint resolution (S. R. 107) to authorize Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, and Prof. Asaph Hall, United States Navy, to accept decorations from the Government of the Republic of France;

A bill (S. 1724) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Black River, in Louisiana;

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 4254) granting to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 1861) for the relief of James Linskey from the operation of the act restricting the ownership of real estate in the Territories and the District of Columbia to American citizens.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the report of the special agent for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska for the year 1894, 6,000 copies, 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

ELISHA B. BASSETT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3503) to correct the military record of Elisha B. Bassett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to revoke, disapprove, and set aside so much of General Orders, No. 253, Headquarters Department of the Cumberland, Chattanooga, Tenn., dated October 23, A. D. 1863, by command of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, general in command, as confirms so much of Special Field Orders, No. 171, Headquarters Department of the Cumberland, Murfreesboro, Tenn., dated June 23, A. D. 1863, Maj. Gen. Rosecrans commanding, as dismissed Capt. Elisha B. Bassett, captain of Company B, Nineteenth Michigan Volunteer Infantry, from the service for cowardice exhibited by deserting his command while engaged with the enemy at the affair of Thompson Station, and to grant and cause to be issued and delivered to the widow of said Elisha B. Bassett a certificate of honorable muster out of the service as of the 23d day of June, A. D. 1863. And the widow and heirs of the said Elisha B. Bassett shall not be entitled by virtue of this act to any pay or allowance subsequent to said 23d day of June, A. D. 1863.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask whether that is not a bill that ought to be considered at a Friday night session? What committee reports it?

Mr. THOMAS. This is a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TALBERT. Then it would not come properly before the Friday night session?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I will ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. FENTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3503) to correct the military record of Elisha B. Bassett, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report as follows:

The said Elisha B. Bassett, now deceased, was, in the year 1863, captain of Company B, Nineteenth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry. In the early part of March of that year Captain Bassett was in command of his company during the march of his regiment from Brentwood to Franklin, Tenn. On the 5th of that month the enemy were encountered near Thompsons Station, Tenn., and during the engagement that followed Captain Bassett turned over the command of his company to the first lieutenant, Hubbard, and retired to the rear. The colonel of the regiment, H. C. Gilbert, thereupon reported Captain Bassett as guilty of cowardice, and recommended his dishonorable dismissal from the service, which recommendation was carried into effect. The purpose of this bill is to correct the military record of Captain Bassett so as to clear his memory from the stain of cowardice, which, we think, unjustly rests upon it.

In support of the bill there were laid before the committee the affidavits of Clark, surgeon, and Bennett, assistant surgeon, of the regiment; Adams, regimental adjutant, and afterwards assistant adjutant general of brigade; Anderson, first lieutenant of Company H, and afterwards major and colonel of the regiment; Shaffer, first lieutenant Company A, and afterwards colonel and brigadier-general, and Privates Bellinger, Beverly, and Ely, of Captain Bassett's company.

The facts supported by the mass of testimony submitted, and based on personal and professional knowledge, are, in substance, that in the fall of 1862, months prior to the engagement at Thompsons Station, Captain Bassett was attacked with tuberculosis, and was so prostrated that he was ordered on leave to recuperate his health, and went to his home in charge of his wife, who had been sent for to nurse him.

After an absence of about two months he rejoined and took command of his company, though greatly emaciated, and remained in service thereafter against the advice of the regimental surgeon. From this time until the following spring he spent considerable time in the hospital, leaving it only a few days before the march to Franklin and the engagement near Thompsons Station. During this march he was obliged to ride in an ambulance, but on meeting the enemy he took personal command of his company and participated in the engagement until a movement up hill being ordered at a double quick he found himself too weak to lead his men and turned over his command to his first lieutenant. This action coming to the notice of the colonel of the regiment, Captain Bassett was reported for cowardice, with the result already stated.

The colonel who preferred the charge and the captain who suffered disgrace are both dead. All the testimony goes to prove the high moral and soldierly qualities of Captain Bassett, and more especially to his conduct in the engagement near Thompsons Station, where he remained in command of his company as long as he was able, and proved himself a brave man. The evidence upon which this report is based also shows that the colonel of the regiment had a strong personal dislike toward Captain Bassett, amounting to a pronounced prejudice, which he took no pains to conceal, and which found voice and expression in the charge of cowardice preferred against Captain Bassett by his superior office. This conclusion seems abundantly warranted by the testimony submitted, which is based on the personal knowledge and observation of the affiants, and their character and opportunities are such as to absolutely compel belief.

The records show that Captain Bassett was mustered into service as captain of Company B, Nineteenth Michigan Volunteer Infantry, September 5, 1862, and that he was dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States by command of Major-General Rosecrans, on the complaint and recommendation of Col. H. C. Gilbert, June 23, 1863.

It should be remembered that Captain Bassett was dismissed without trial, against which injustice he earnestly protested.

It is therefore considered an act of the merest justice that the cloud of dishonor which darkened Captain Bassett's life and followed him to his grave should now be lifted from his memory.

The committee therefore approve the bill and heartily recommend its passage.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it is a bill to remove the charge of desertion or a bill to revoke the order of a court-martial?

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is neither.

Mr. TALBERT. This man was regularly court-martialed, as I understand.

Mr. THOMAS. He was not court-martialed. He had no trial; he was dismissed simply by an order.

Mr. TALBERT. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman in charge of this bill take the position that a captain in active command of a company during an engagement is ever justified in turning over his command and going to the rear?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; unless it is impossible for him to continue in command, as it was in this case.

The record shows that Captain Bassett was ill and had been so for months, and got out of an ambulance and took command of his company at the time the charge was ordered; that he stayed with his company during the engagement until they reached the hill, in going up which he was compelled to resign his command.

Mr. STEELE. What is the name of the officer who ordered his dismissal?

Mr. THOMAS. Colonel Gilbert first made the order, and it was confirmed by General Thomas and General Rosecrans.

Mr. STEELE. I object to the consideration of the bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not intend to object, but I did intend to make some remarks on this kind of legislation.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

J. J. LINTS.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 145) for the relief of J. J. Lints.

The bill was read.

Mr. POOLE. I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. HEPBURN (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order as against that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do that for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar, this being Friday, and the House in this session never yet having gone to that Order of Business.

Mr. POOLE. I would like to say a word, if I may be allowed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has objected to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. This bill, I take it, will come up in its regular order if we can go to the Private Calendar, the business of the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] gave notice that he would move to take up the sundry civil appropriation bill this morning.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the proper way to raise the question of consideration would be in Committee of the Whole; or would it be proper to ask the House to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, giving notice that if that is done I will move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the sundry civil appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. That would be the proper way to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. CANNON. Then I ask the House to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a division. I rise——

Mr. HEPBURN. I call the gentleman to order. This is not debatable.

Mr. CANNON. I am not debating it.

Mr. Speaker, I rise——

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman can not debate the question, I insist.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. It is not debatable.

Mr. CANNON. I am not debating it. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. I want the House to understand what it is voting on——

Mr. HEPBURN. I call the gentleman to order. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not in order, after having raised the question of consideration on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, for the Chair to state to the House what is involved in that question of consideration, so that the House can understand what it is voting on? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois answers itself.

However, if the House votes down the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, it will be in order to proceed to the public business, as usual, under the rule.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEPBURN, the House divided; and there were—ayes 90, noes 66.

Mr. CANNON. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. HEPBURN were appointed tellers.

The House proceeded to divide. Before the announcement of the result,

Mr. CANNON said: I ask the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker, at once on this motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 145, nays 77, not voting 132; as follows:

Mr. HENRY of Indiana with Mr. KENDALL.

Mr. BREWSTER with Mr. RUSSELL of Georgia.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey with Mr. RUSK.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio with Mr. OWENS.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire with Mr. MOSES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana with Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. REYBURN with Mr. MCKENNEY.

Mr. LITTLE with Mr. DINSMORE.

Mr. STRONG with Mr. STROWD of North Carolina.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts with Mr. BELL of Texas.

Mr. MILLER of West Virginia with Mr. WOODARD.

Mr. HADLEY with Mr. MCDEARMON.

Mr. DOVENER with Mr. CATCHINGS.

Mr. HEMENWAY with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Mr. HOOKER with Mr. MINER of New York.

Mr. DALZELL with Mr. MCMILLIN.

Mr. HUBBARD with Mr. DOCKERY.

Mr. LEIGHTY with Mr. BANKHEAD.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I find that I am paired, and shall therefore withdraw my vote. I voted in the negative on this question.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. TURNER, is detained from the House by reason of sickness. I ask leave of absence for him until Monday.

BERNARD R. GREEN.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution sent over from the Senate this morning, providing for the appointment of a successor to the late General Casey. I do so in behalf of the Library Committee, and if my request can be entertained I hope it will be at this time.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. QUIGG. I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The joint resolution (S. R. 114) authorizing and directing Bernard R. Green to exercise the duties and powers heretofore conferred upon the late Thomas L. Casey in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object; but as this makes a charge upon the Treasury, while I have no desire to delay it, I shall ask the gentleman to ask either that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to consider it, or that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. As I say, I have no desire to delay it, but there ought to be some little explanation about it, and possibly some amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. If it is going to require delay I shall have to object.

Mr. QUIGG. I do not think it will cause delay.

Mr. HEPBURN. It will if you go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Regular order.

Mr. CANNON. I have no desire to make any delay. I only ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] demands the regular order. In accordance with the vote already announced, the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] will please take the chair.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following resolution——

Mr. CANNON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PICKLER. This is the regular order.

Mr. CANNON. I do not so understand it. The rule provides what shall be done when we go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PICKLER. That is just my motion exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution. The Chair will then determine the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. All I do is to demand the regular order.

Mr. PICKLER. This is the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I move that business on the Private Calendar from the Committees on Claims and War Claims be passed over without prejudice, and that bills from the Committees on Invalid Pensions, Pensions, and Military Affairs be taken up for consideration in their order upon the Calendar.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make a point of order against that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is the point of order made?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will consider the point of order pending and will hear gentlemen upon it.

Mr. PICKLER. I refer to paragraph 4 of Rule XXIII:

4. In Committees of the Whole House business on their calendars may be taken up in regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine, unless the bill to be considered was determined by the House at the time of going into committee, but bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors shall have precedence.

I offer the resolution now, Mr. Chairman, in accordance with this provision, that the committee lay aside without prejudice bills from the Committee on Claims and from the Committee on War Claims and proceed to take up bills reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions, Pensions, and Military Affairs.

I think, Mr. Chairman, this is too plain for any argument. It is the language of the rule, about which there can be no doubt, because the rule says that in Committees of the Whole House business on the Private Calendar may be taken up in the regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine.

If this resolution is carried, the Committee of the Whole can lay aside without prejudice bills reported from the Committees on Claims and War Claims, and that will enable us, as the resolution further provides, to take up business reported from the Committees on Invalid Pensions, Pensions, and Military Affairs. And I may say, Mr. Chairman, besides this being perfectly in order, in accordance with the rule, it seems to me it would be very advisable for this committee so to do. We have had experience here in the years past in trying to do something with the large number of private bills reported from other committees, and we have never yet made much headway with them. While I have nothing to say against the other bills, there are a large number of gentlemen in this committee interested in these bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, from the Committee on Pensions, and from the Committee on Military Affairs. It seems to me advisable that we should adopt this resolution and proceed to the consideration of pension bills and bills from the Committee on Military Affairs. We have a large Calendar of those bills, and a great many members are desirous that they should be considered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman that his proposition will consume the time allowed for the Private Calendar for private claims, when we have given him every Friday night for pensions. That is the practical result of the gentleman's motion.

Mr. PICKLER. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for order. It is impossible to hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to hear this statement as to why the point of order is not good.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to correct the gentleman from Georgia. We have stood here Friday night after Friday night and have not passed a bill through the House on a Friday night, as the point of no quorum has been made from that side, and for four weeks we have not been able to pass a bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. The gentleman from South Dakota must confine himself to the point of order. The merits of the case are not in issue.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is not a question of the wisdom of the matter.

Mr. PICKLER. The rule determines that it is in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What rule does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. PICKLER. Paragraph 4 of Rule XXIII. It is too plain to need any argument:

In Committee of the Whole House, business on their Calendar may be taken up in the regular order—

That is, taking the first bill, and then consecutively—or in such order as the committee may determine.

Now, I offer a resolution stating the order in which they shall be taken up.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The committee is not in session under that item. I want to state that the rule sets apart Friday for the consideration of matters on the Private Calendar, and we are not in session under the item the gentleman suggests.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This rule was modified expressly, as it is clearly in recollection of the older members of this House, for the purpose of preventing procedure upon the Calendar from being blocked Friday after Friday through the whole session, as it was in former Congresses, because some obnoxious bill stood at the head of the Calendar and could not be evaded or avoided, there being no way by which to pass it over; and in order that the Committee of the Whole should be enabled to do business, and not be blocked because some bill at the head of the Calendar was obnoxious to the views of a large number of the House, this rule was made to enable the Committee of the Whole to take bills up in such order as it might determine or in the regular order of the business on the Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If I may be pardoned——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Maine is correct that the House has——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will state his point of order against the written motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The House is in session in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar under the special rule of the House which provides that every Friday, unless otherwise ordered by the House, shall be set apart for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. Now, this House refused otherwise to decide, when it decided to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BOUTELLE. We are on it now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And the gentleman from Maine reads item 4 of Rule XXIII, which provides:

In Committees of the Whole House business on their calendars may be taken up in the regular order.

While we are in Committee of the Whole House. It is Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and it is not in the Committee of the Whole to which the gentleman from Maine is addressing himself. When we go into Committee of the Whole the difficulty which the gentleman suggested arose several years ago, when an effort was made to pass over the appropriation bills and take up the tariff bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It was an omnibus war claim bill, reported by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Enloe.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was to take up a tariff bill, but the rule provided that that could only be done by unanimous consent. In other words, to refuse to consider bills on the Private Calendar it required unanimous consent to do so; and if objection was made the Committee of the Whole House should rise and report that objection to the House, and then the House would go through a form of directing the committee to pass over that bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This rule was framed, if the gentleman will pardon me——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not be interrupted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield in a moment. This provision was made to obviate that objection—that when you go into Committee on the Private Calendar you must take them up in the order in which they are on the Calendar.

Mr. BOUTELLE. One express reason of the rule being modified was that the Private Calendar was blocked, as we all remember, by a long omnibus bill, reported, I believe, from the Committee on War Claims, I think, by Mr. Enloe of Tennessee, and this was modified to prevent business being blocked by such bills; so the language was put this way:

In Committees of the Whole House business on their calendars—

On the committee calendars; that includes the Private Calendar—may be taken up in their regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine.

And this committee will now proceed to determine on it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, I will say in reply that the gentleman states that this modification was inserted to meet the difficulty presented by an omnibus war claim bill reported by Mr. Enloe. Now, that bill, Mr. Chairman, was reported in the Fifty-second Congress. This item to which the gentleman is addressing himself is a part of the rule of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why, we had the same experience in the Fiftieth Congress and in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But Mr. Enloe had no bill in the Forty-ninth or Fiftieth Congress to pay this class of claims in bulk.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Yes, but it was of the same general character of bills as that which Mr. Enloe introduced that had been blocking the way in previous Congresses.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now the gentleman is again mistaken, because the only general bill of that kind was brought in and passed by the Fifty-first Congress and the claims paid. There never were any general bills prior to the Fifty-first Congress. Consequently the gentleman is clearly mistaken; and I distinctly remember that in the Fiftieth Congress the effort was made to pass over some appropriation bills in order to reach a tariff bill which the gentleman from Texas desired to have considered. Older members of the House will remember that fact. This amendment was put in in the Fifty-first Congress simply to enable the Committee of the Whole, when it wanted to consider some particular appropriation bill, to decide the question of consideration for itself. But, Mr. Chairman, it has never been decided, and, in my opinion, an instance can not be found where any such motion was made when the Private Calendar was under consideration on the day set apart by the rules for that business.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard for a moment on this point of order. It seems to me that the point is well taken. We must consider two rules of the House, not only the fourth subdivision of Rule XXIII, but also Rule XXVI, and our procedure here is governed by Rule XXVI. Now, what are the two salient provisions of that rule? First, that—

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by the House.

Second, that—

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered, etc.

The motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, not for the purpose of considering your private pension bills, or bills for the removal of political disabilities, but for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PICKLER. That is right.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The fourth subdivision of Rule XXIII gives us a certain discretion, namely, to pass over one bill, say No. 33, and take up No. 34 when we come to that bill; but it does not give us discretion to interfere with another rule of the House by passing over a whole class of bills and to decide that we shall be relegated and confined to the regular business of the Friday evening session. That would be a monstrous construction. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on this question. Section 6 of Rule XXIV provides that—

On Friday of each week, after the unfinished business has been disposed of, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar, etc.

The first paragraph of Rule XXVI provides that—

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business unless otherwise determined by the House.

And the second paragraph provides that—

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered, etc.

That, of course, is mandatory upon the House. Paragraph 4 of Rule XXIII provides that after the House has gone into Committee of the Whole House the committee can then determine the order of business that shall be pursued, and the Chair holds that it is clearly within the province of the committee to determine whether it will take up the bills in the order in which they are found on the Private Calendar or whether, by motion, as proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], it will proceed to take up a certain class of private bills. The language of paragraph 4 of Rule XXIII, as it seems to the Chair, is clear upon the subject. The Chair therefore holds that the written motion submitted by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] is in order.

Mr. SWANSON. The ruling of the Chair depends to a great extent, of course, upon the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. If the gentleman's motion was that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider business on the Private Calendar in the order in which it stands there, of course that would preclude such a ruling as the Chair has just made. Now, I would like to know what the form of the motion of the gentleman from Iowa was, as submitted by the Speaker, and upon which the House voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was that the House should resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar. That left it for the committee to determine, after the House had resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, the order in which the business on the Private Calendar should be taken up.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. SWANSON. Do the minutes show just what the motion was, as submitted by the gentleman from Iowa?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair presumes they do. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] is recognized.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order under Rule XXV, which provides that—

All questions relating to priority of business shall be decided by a majority without debate.

This question is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken; but the debate was upon the point of order which has been raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, and therefore the Chair allowed the discussion to go on.

Mr. PICKLER. But that question has been decided.

The CHAIRMAN. That question has been decided.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point of order that there is no point of order now pending, the Chair having passed upon the one raised by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE], who states that he desires to offer an amendment to the resolution pending before the committee.

Mr. McRAE. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to amend by adding to the words of the resolution "beginning at the foot of the Calendar."

Can I be heard upon the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is not debatable.

Mr. TALBERT. If in order, I would like to have the original resolution read.

Mr. McRAE. Does the Chair hold that I am not entitled to debate the resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not held anything yet.

Mr. McRAE. I insist that I have the right, then, to hold the floor until the Chair does rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Rule XXV provides that all questions relating to priority of business shall be decided by a majority without debate. The Chair thinks the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas relates to the order of business, and is not debatable.

Mr. McRAE. Then in that case I will not hold the floor. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. What amendment does the gentleman from Arkansas suggest?

Mr. McRAE. I move to strike out of the resolution of the gentleman from South Dakota the words "in their order" and insert "beginning at the foot of the Calendar."

Mr. MAHON. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would not be in order to entertain another amendment at this time.

Mr. MAHON. Then I will wait until the others are disposed of.

Mr. SWANSON. Is there not a substitute pending for the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas? If not, I desire to offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. MAHON. I move to amend by inserting "that no cases of desertion shall be considered under that order."

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from South Dakota will permit me, I think perhaps I may be able to offer a suggestion that will satisfy all sides. I suggest that he modify the resolution by calling the bills on the Calendar, one at the head and another at the foot, thus alternating through the day. Many of us have bills scattered through the Calendar, and we can never reach them by proceeding as the gentleman's order proposes.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from Illinois has had much experience here and knows that by proceeding in that manner we will finally strike one of those bills to which objection is made, and require us to spend the whole day in its consideration without effecting any result.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is not debatable. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What is the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no claims for desertions shall be considered in order under this resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, that is an amendment in the first degree, and would be only in order after the others have been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that the point of order is well taken, and the question therefore recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, which will be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask what has become of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not now in order.

The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "in their order on the Calendar" and insert "beginning at the foot of the Calendar."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 32, noes 96.

Mr. MCRAE. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. MCRAE and Mr. PICKLER were appointed tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. PICKLER.

Mr. TERRY. I move an amendment to the pending resolution, that we begin at the middle of the Calendar and alternate both ways.

Mr. PICKLER. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is too indefinite. Nobody knows what the middle of the Calendar is.

Mr. TERRY. Why, it is a mere matter of mathematical calculation. We have some five hundred and eighty or ninety bills on the Calendar. But I will make it more definite. I move that we begin with No. 286 on the Calendar.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

Mr. TERRY. Why is it dilatory?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule both points of order, and allow the committee to determine the amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is it in order to pile up these amendments here?

Mr. GROW. Let us have a vote. Question!

Mr. BOUTELLE. Please do not call the question while I am addressing the Chair.

Mr. GROUT. This matter is not debatable.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says I have no business to address the Chair, but with the indulgence of the Chair I desire to ask a parliamentary question, whether these amendments are in order, amendment after amendment without limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the point of order was made by the gentleman from South Dakota that the motion was indefinite, and by the gentleman from Nebraska that it was dilatory. The Chair overrules the point of order, and will submit the amendment for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But my inquiry was whether the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota is amendable without limit.

Mr. TERRY. Why, when you vote down one amendment another can be offered, of course. That is the parliamentary law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That we begin at No. 286 on the Calendar and alternate each way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TERRY. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 82.

Mr. TERRY. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. TERRY and Mr. PICKLER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 20, noes 85.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the pending amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The clerk read as follows:

That Calendar No. 158 be first considered—a bill for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

Mr. PICKLER. I am glad to see you do something pious; but I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Can we be heard on that amendment? Does the Chair hold that debate is not in order on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No debate relating to the order of business is permissible under Rule XXV, and the Chair has so held. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SWANSON. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 75.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 37, and the noes are 75. The noes have it——

Mr. SWANSON. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PITNEY. Too late, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. SWANSON and Mr. PICKLER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 6, noes 94.

Accordingly, the substitute was rejected.

Mr. PICKLER. I call for a vote on my motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the pending amendment, to consider the claim of the Southwestern Presbyterian University. There are a thousand petitions here in favor of that claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the——

Mr. RICHARDSON. It has not been read yet, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

That we consider No. 4435 on the Private Calendar, a bill for the relief of Stewart College (now the Southwestern Presbyterian University), located at Clarksville, Tenn.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is dilatory.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on that. If that is not a meritorious motion, then I have never made one——

Mr. DALZELL. That is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Of course it is in the power of the Chair to do so. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will please observe order. Gentlemen will please resume their seats. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

The question was taken on Mr. PICKLER's motion; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 1.

Mr. SWANSON. No quorum.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Count, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the committee). One hundred and thirty-three members—a quorum—are present. The ayes have it, and the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] is adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COOPER of Texas. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PICKLER. I believe I addressed the Chair first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to entertain the gentleman's motion.

M. R. WILLIAM GREBE.

Mr. PICKLER. The first bill under that order is from the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is the bill H. R. 3139, Calendar No. 36, at the bottom of page 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3139) for the relief of M. R. William Grebe.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke the order by which M. R. William Grebe was separated from the military service of the United States as a captain of the Fourth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and to honorably discharge said Grebe, to date from the 12th day of December, 1864.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBERT. The point of order is this: As the Committee of the Whole have decided to take up only bills reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I will call attention to the fact that on last Friday evening, when the committee rose, they were discussing a bill for the relief of Charles E. Jones. As you have decided to consider only bills from the Invalid Pensions Committee, I make the point of order that you must begin where you left off.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not well taken. The gentleman from South Carolina has evidently misapprehended the motion of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. TALBERT. Possibly so. I think there is a great deal of misapprehension going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not responsible for that. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the following amendments:

First, strike out the word "separated," in the fifth line of said bill, and insert in lieu thereof the word "dismissed."

Amend by adding to the bill the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing herein shall entitle said M. R. William Grebe to any back pay or allowances to which he might have been entitled but for the action of such court-martial."

Mr. McCLELLAN. The report.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will please read the report.

The report (by Mr. Tarsney) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3139) entitled "A bill for the relief of M. R. William Grebe," and having considered the same, respectfully report:

It appears from the official records of the War Department that M. R. William Grebe was mustered into the service as first lieutenant of Company I, Fourth Missouri Cavalry, November 22, 1862; he was promoted to be captain April 5, 1864, and was assigned to Company F of that regiment; he was detached and assigned to duty as aid-de-camp on the staff of the major-general commanding the Department of the Tennessee on July 5, 1864; he was cashiered December 12, 1864, by a sentence of a general court-martial promulgated in General Orders, No. 223, of that date, Department of the Missouri. From the record of the court-martial, its evidence, and the action taken thereon by the reviewing authority, and the report of the Judge-Advocate-General of the Army to the President of the United States, upon an application for Executive clemency in behalf of said Captain Grebe, it fully appears that one Ferdinand Hanson, then a captain in Company D, Fourth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, M. R. William Grebe, major and aid-de-camp of the governor of the State of Missouri and captain of Company F, Fourth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and Gottlieb C. Rose, then a captain of Company C, said Fourth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, were jointly tried by court-martial in December, 1864, upon the following charges, to wit: The said Captain Hanson, first, for sending a challenge to another officer to fight a duel; second, dueling, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline. The said Major Grebe, first, accepting a challenge from another officer to fight a duel; second, dueling, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline. The said Captain Rose, first, promoting a challenge to fight a duel; second, aiding and promoting a duel, to the prejudice of good order and military discipline.

The several specifications alleged in substance that said Captain Hanson sent a challenge to fight a duel to said Major Grebe; that Major Grebe accepted the same; that a duel was fought by these parties; that the said Captain Rose promoted and aided the same by furnishing them with pistols and by other aid, countenance, encouragement, and presence.

To the charges and specifications respectively alleged against them, each of said parties pleaded guilty, were convicted thereof on said 12th day of December, 1864, and sentenced to be cashiered.

In his address to the court Captain Hanson stated in substance that he was of foreign birth and had been educated in the manners and customs of a foreign country, and that the habits and thoughts which there prevailed had been to some extent impressed upon his character and formed a part thereof.

That the custom and practice of the duello obtained generally with the officers of the army of Schlesswig-Holstein, his native country, in which army he had formerly served, and although not recognized by law, yet when this practice of settling differences was pursued under circumstances of an extreme character, it by no means incurred the displeasure of the Government, and seldom deprived a soldier of rank or the privilege of defending his country in the field. He also called attention of the court to the fact that this practice prevailed to an extent in other countries, and to a considerable extent in the United States and in the Army of the United States; and called attention to the case of General Sumner and General Harney, the former of whom sent and the latter of whom accepted a challenge to fight a duel. While not arguing in favor of the practice to justify himself or combating the propriety of the regulations of the Army, which prohibited such practice, he endeavored to impress upon the court that in erring as he had he was entitled to some consideration in consequence of the early training and education he had received as a soldier in his native country.

In his address to the court Major Grebe stated that he was brought up in Europe as an officer, that he had been but a short time in this country; that according to usage in the old country he was obliged to accept the challenge; that he was still in the service of the King of Norway and was only on furlough to fight for the Union, and expected to resume his position as first lieutenant in the service of the King of Norway; that according to his idea and the usage of the old country he would have been considered infamous if he had not accepted this challenge, and other officers would not have associated with him; that he was not at the time a citizen of the United States and knew nothing of its laws.

Captain Rose stated to the court that he had been in this country only since 1861.

All the members of the court earnestly recommended Major Grebe to the leniency of the commanding general in consideration of the peculiar nature of the cases as presented by the several statements of the accused.

An application was made to the President for a review of the finding of the court in regard to these officers. The records show a petition of his excellency Thomas C. Fletcher, then governor of Missouri; Brig. Gens. S. A. Meredith, I. T. Copeland, John McNeil, Thomas Ewing, jr., George H. Hall; of Colonel Barstow, president, and Colonel Williams and Major Dietz, members of the court by whom they were tried; of John B. Gray, adjutant-general of Missouri, and others, praying the Executive, in consideration of the history and respective military careers of these officers, and for the interest of the service, that the record of their dismissal be set aside, that their services might be again placed at the disposal of the Government, and that they each might be reinstated with the rank they respectively held at the time of their dismissal.

Major-General Dodge certifies that he was acquainted with Major Grebe during the Atlanta campaign and knew him to be a reliable, brave, and competent officer. Hon. John B. Henderson, then a United States Senator from the State of Missouri, indorses the petition in the following words, namely:

"Mr. PRESIDENT: These men have no fault except that they want to fight too much. It is a good fault at present. Please restore them."

The application for reinstatement was denied, not on account of want of merit in the application, but on account of want of Executive authority.

The record indisputably shows Major Grebe to have been a brave, intelligent, and efficient officer, whose service for more than two years was so conspicuous as to particularly commend him to his superior officers and to the governor of the State who commissioned him—so conspicuous that Governor Fletcher made a special application to the President to remove Major Grebe's disability in order that his services might be utilized by the governor in raising a new regiment.

There is no question as to the legality of the proceedings of the court-martial, that the offenses alleged in the charges clearly constituted violations of the regulations governing the Army, or that such offenses at the time were prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

Your committee, however, are of the opinion that the previous education of this officer and the sentiment relating to the practice of the duello then prevalent in the country in which he was educated and to a considerable extent prevalent in our own country and Army at the time, while not justifying the officer for his offense, distinguishes such offense from the ordinary offenses violative of good order and military discipline, and appeals strongly at this time for the removal of the stain upon his otherwise unexceptionally creditable military record.

In consideration of the fact that sentiment favorable to the settlement of private dispute between citizens or between officers of the Army in this country by appeal to the duello has now happily entirely disappeared, the action here recommended will not be considered a precedent or encouragement for the revival of such sentiment, the committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

First, strike out the word "separated," in the fifth line of said bill, and insert, in lieu thereof, the word "dismissed."

Amend by adding to the bill the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing herein shall entitle said M. R. William Grebe to any back pay or allowances to which he might have been entitled but for the action of such court-martial."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I rise to inquire whether debate is to be absolutely cut off, or are we allowed to be heard on these pension bills?

Mr. PICKLER. Regular order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is debatable.

Mr. PICKLER. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. BLUE. I move the adoption of the amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is not in order to vote upon the amendments in gross, and I make that point of order. Besides, general debate has not been closed; and I object to voting on the amendments until general debate at least is closed on this bill, unless it is determined to close general debate without any explanation. I would like to hear something, Mr. Chairman, in favor of the passage of this bill by the gentleman from Kansas who introduced it. I want to hear the gentleman, if he wants to discuss it.

Mr. BLUE. The first thing is for the Chair to pass on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments are debatable.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The bill is debatable also.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments are now being considered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. How is that, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is correct. The whole question is debatable—the bill and amendments.

Mr. BLUE. I suppose the motion is in order. I desire to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that when he understands this bill I am satisfied he will not object to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? I have asked an explanation, Mr. Chairman, of the merits of this bill in general debate. I have no objection to its passage, but I could not understand the reading of the report in the confusion on the floor, and I was in hopes that the gentleman in general debate would tell us something of the merits of this bill. We have not closed general debate now. That is the point I wanted to be understood.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to be heard on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. BLUE. This bill is for the relief of a soldier who was in the service of the King of Norway when our civil conflict began. He came by permission of his sovereign to this country to participate in the conflict on the side of the Union. He served with distinction, and participated in some 17 battles courageously and honorably. While the conflict was going on he attended a theater at St. Louis with a young lady who was the daughter of some member of the official family of that State. While there an officer of our Army insulted him in the presence of the lady. He returned home with her, and when he met that officer again he thrashed him soundly. For that the officer who had given the first insult challenged him, saying that he was a smaller man physically than Major Grebe, and that he might be able to thrash him with his fists, but that he did not dare to meet him in conflict with arms. Major Grebe accepted the challenge, and, as this report shows, an officer who was also educated in military affairs in the Old World became his second, while a third one procured the arms. They went upon the field of honor and Captain Grebe shot his man, but not mortally, and his antagonist shot a hole through Major Grebe's clothes. They were both arraigned before a court-martial, and the court, upon the plea of guilty with extenuating circumstances, entered a judgment cashiering each; but that court, immediately after entering this judgment of dismissal, unanimously joined in a recommendation to the President of the United States to remove and set aside the judgment of the court by pardoning Major Grebe. On the recommendation of the Judge-Advocate-General it was refused. The recommendation of the Judge-Advocate-General is included in the report on this bill.

The ground upon which he opposed it was that it was highly immoral and highly detrimental to the good of the service that officers should be permitted to fight duels and be relieved from the effects of them by pardon. Your attention is called to the fact shown in the report that Major Grebe said to the court in extenuation of what he had done that in his country it was regarded an honor to fight a duel when you were challenged, and that it would have been an everlasting disgrace for him in the land in which he was born and educated to have declined to accept this challenge, and not being educated in our institutions and not understanding our laws and regulations, he accepted the challenge and believed that he was doing honorable service when he fought that duel. He cited also the fact that in this country up to that time the duello had not been regarded as dishonorable, and he cited the fact that General Harney and General Hunter had been guilty of the offense, the one being challenged by the other and he having accepted the challenge to fight a duel. Under these circumstances, now, in his old age, he feels keenly the effect of this dismissal, which occurred many years ago, and all that he asks in this bill is that he may have this stigma removed.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. What is his age?

Mr. BLUE. He must be 60 or 65 years of age. His hair is white as wool, and the old man, in his declining years, said to me, with tears in his eyes, "I can not become a member of the Grand Army, and when Decoration Day comes, and the procession goes by, my children inquire of me why I am not there, and I have to tell them that I was dimissed from the service and that I am not entitled to be recognized as a defender of the nation." It seems to me that under the circumstances of this case my friends from the South especially ought not to object to a bill of this character.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I see this bill contains a proviso that "nothing herein shall entitle the said William Grebe to any back pay or allowances to which he might have been entitled but for the action of such court-martial." I wish to ask what benefit this officer would receive from the passage of the bill other than that which the gentleman in charge of the bill has mentioned?

Mr. BLUE. It removes from him the stigma of a dishonorable discharge, but it gives him no back pay or allowance. That proviso was added by the committee and I did not object to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My question is, what further effect this bill would have on this soldier so far as his financial status is concerned? What right does it give him as to a future pension?

Mr. BLUE. There seems to be some difference of opinion as to what would be the effect of the proviso in that respect. I think the effect is to preclude him from receiving any back pay. For instance, whatever pay may have been due him at the time of his dismissal is forfeited by the judgment of the court-martial, but I do not think he would be prohibited from prosecuting a claim for a pension. So far as that proviso goes, it was put in there by way of precaution, so that the bill should not set aside or attempt to set aside any part of the executed portion of the sentence of the court-martial. That amendment was made by the committee intelligently, I have no doubt, because the Senate, I understand, insists strenuously upon the proposition that an execution of a judgment when once complete shall not be disturbed. Hence that proviso leaves the judgment of the court-martial undisturbed so far as back pay or other such compensation is concerned, but it removes the stigma of dismissal from this officer's record, so that he may prosecute a pension claim if he so desires.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I will now use a portion of my time. I have not risen for the purpose of making any very sharp opposition to the passage of this bill. In some respects it seems to be a meritorious bill, but I can not understand why it is to be regarded as any more meritorious than several other measures that are pending upon the Private Calendar. I can not see why this bill should be singled out for consideration, a bill applying to a man who has been convicted of an offense against the law and made the subject of a sentence from which this bill seeks to relieve him.

Mr. BLUE. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I wish to say that I do not understand that this bill is singled out. By the order under which we are now proceeding it is the first bill reached.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the very point that I am addressing myself to. This bill is singled out—a bill relieving a man from the effects of a sentence passed upon him for having violated the law in respect to dueling, a very grave and serious offense. To consider that bill we lay aside other measures, we lay aside these claims from my section of the country, and we undertake this partial legislation upon this at least doubtful subject.

I wish to say a word as to why I raised the question a while ago. When, in response to the appeals of gentlemen this morning, I assisted them to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, I did think that we on this side would be treated as we have been treated in former Congresses, and that bills in which we are interested, highly meritorious bills, would be considered in the order in which they are found upon the Private Calendar. They are placed there by the committees of this House appointed by the Speaker, and we have confidence in these committees. They are regularly reported from those committees and entered upon the Private Calendar in their order. Our rules provide that Friday of every week shall be devoted, unless the House otherwise expressly directs, to the consideration of bills on that Calendar. In all my experience here I have never known an instance where the House was pressed into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar as it was this morning, and where then, by this—I will not call it legerdemain, because that might not be parliamentary, and I do not want to make any offensive intimation—but I will say where this unfair and unusual method has been adopted to evade the consideration of the bills in their order on the Calendar, and I say it is unfair to those who assisted in going into Committee of the Whole under the idea that the Private Calendar was to be considered and that business upon that Calendar was to be taken up in its order.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman's position is equivalent to saying that no pension legislation shall pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, my friend ought not to say that.

Mr. PICKLER. Let me show the gentleman why I say it. The private claim bills to which he refers are at the head of the Calendar, and none of our pension bills are where they can be reached, and for three or four Congresses, since I have been here, never on a Friday afternoon, when we have been considering the Private Calendar, has a pension bill been reached.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from South Dakota is a fair fighter, and I do not object to that kind of warfare. The gentleman knows that on every Friday evening—meeting at about half past 7 o'clock or 8 o'clock, and lasting until 10 o'clock and 30 minutes, every Friday evening throughout the session—this House meets for the consideration of private pension bills. Is not that true?

Mr. PICKLER. In connection with other bills; yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In connection with bills reported from one other committee for the purpose of removing political disabilities and charges of desertion. Now, the gentleman is not satisfied.

Mr. PICKLER. No; certainly not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why not?

Mr. PICKLER. I will tell the gentleman——

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, I am perfectly willing to give you another night, if you are not content with one; that is, I will vote with you to have another night, or take any other action that may be considered necessary in order to secure the consideration of bills to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me to say this further? I do not think that there was a design of this sort on this side of the House when the motion of the gentleman from Iowa was made and adopted, and when the House declined to go into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill—that is to say, that in regard to this matter of the consideration of the pension bills, it came up later.

Now, I want to know if the gentleman from Tennessee thinks this is the way to get the consideration of his private claims hereafter? Does he think that by filibustering against the rule of the House which we are now acting under he will promote the consideration of those claims? If so, I fear he is mistaken. Further, I think that there is a sense of fairness on this side of the House and a desire to have these claims considered, and in my opinion, if the gentleman from Tennessee would act the part of wisdom and let us go on under the rule—I speak, of course, for myself only—that on next Friday we will no doubt take up the Calendar and begin at the very beginning of it and have a try at the consideration of these bills at least.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from South Dakota does me a great injustice to say or to intimate that I filibustered against the consideration of private pension bills. I have been in Congress with the gentleman for eight years, I think, and I never have filibustered against a private pension claim, and I think the gentleman will certainly bear me out in that if he will reflect for a moment.

Mr. PICKLER. I think that is true.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman knows it is true.

Mr. PICKLER. But the demonstration of the gentleman today is at least very suspicious.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not at all; it means that we resent the treatment we are receiving at the hands of those we cooperated with in voting to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

And I want to answer the gentleman further. The gentleman says that at this time I am occupying the position of filibustering against the consideration of private pension bills. Now, I have shown, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman has every Friday night for the consideration of his bills. Claims and war claims have every Friday, and I ask the gentleman if he has not already had every Friday night for the consideration of his bills—every Friday night when he himself has not consented to dispense with the evening session—for the consideration of private pension bills since the first Monday in December? He has, I will answer for him, and has had three hours or more every day—that is, every Friday evening—for the consideration of these bills.

I ask him in that connection if he has known this House, from the beginning of this session, to give one solitary moment to the consideration of those bills on the Private Calendar that come from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, and which have been reported by the committees of this Congress? I ask him also if Friday, under the rules, is not solemnly set apart for the consideration of just such claims, and if on a single Friday we have been permitted to go into Committee of the Whole to consider them?

Mr. PICKLER. I have not charge of the bills coming from the Committee on Claims or War Claims. How many Fridays has the gentleman moved to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of these bills?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did last Friday.

Mr. PICKLER. That is the solitary exception.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I moved on last Friday that the House go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of these bills and was not treated very ceremoniously. The Speaker informed me that a motion of a higher order was pending.

Now, I repeat, every Friday is set apart for the consideration of bills which we seek to have considered here to-day. We are not asking anything that is revolutionary or violent. We are only asking that the House shall adhere to its own rule. What are the bills that are here? You know what they are. They are bills that come from these committees after due and full consideration, every facility having been given to them for their consideration; and every solitary one that we want considered is a bill which has been passed upon by the Court of Claims, that tribunal consisting of five Republicans—not a single Democrat on the court.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Are you opposing the passage of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I do not know whether I am yet or not. I am not entirely satisfied with the method of getting it before us.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that the Court of Claims has charge of these bills and refers them back to our committees. There are five members of that court, all Republicans. Now, what is done with a bill when it is referred to them? The first step in the consideration of the bill is to ascertain that the claimant was loyal. That does not affect me. I was not loyal during the war. I am not, therefore, partial to them because of political prejudice or bias. Fortunately, or unfortunately, as you may look at it, I was on the losing side in the past. But all of these claims come mainly from my country. The Court of Claims must find, as a jurisdictional fact, that the claimant was loyal. That objection stands in the court as a bar to further progress until it is removed by affirmative proof. Now, after that is done; after the loyalty of the claimant is ascertained, the claim is again referred to the same tribunal, just as to a master in chancery, to take proof upon the merits. Then, after that, if the court decides the claim is meritorious, a second finding is made and returned with the papers to Congress that the appropriations may be made.

Mr. Chairman, I insist that there ought to be no objection to the payment——

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman refers to war claims that are referred to the Court of Claims simply for the finding of facts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under the Bowman Act.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no adjudication by the Court of Claims on those cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is an adjudication.

Mr. DINGLEY. No adjudication, but simply a finding of facts. They are to be tried out by the House the same as any claim subsequently.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman will not say that it is not an adjudication of a fact.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is a determination of a fact, but as to whether or no the facts justify an appropriation has to be determined by Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman from Maine will pardon me, Congress determined that in 1864, because they commenced affirmative action then, and said that "whenever a claimant is loyal in the insurrectionary States and his property is taken and used by the Army we will pay him for it." That affirmative action rests upon the statute book to-day.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the gentleman must be aware that every one of these claims to which he is referring was adjudicated by the Southern Claims Commission and rejected, or else these claims did not have merit enough to be presented.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman was never more mistaken in his life.

Mr. DINGLEY. To present the idea that these claims have been adjudicated in the Court of Claims, in any sense in which we speak of "adjudication," is not correct.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is altogether mistaken when he says that all of these claims have been rejected; and I will tell him why.

Mr. DINGLEY. They have been rejected or else not presented, one or the other.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; they were presented before the bar of the statute, which commenced on the 1st of January, 1880. Claims filed since that date are barred and can not be and are not considered.

Mr. DINGLEY. Every one of these claims is barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. RICHARDSON. They are not barred. They are not considered by the Court of Claims if filed subsequently to the 1st of January, 1880. Now, the gentleman's statement that they have all been rejected is not true. The gentleman doubtless thinks so; but I will tell him why it is not so. A great many of these claims were filed and pending before the Southern Claims Commission. The gentleman knows that the law providing for that commission terminated the commission by its own operation, and when it was terminated there were thousands of cases pending which had never been heard at all.

What did Congress order done with those claims? It ordered them filed before the Committee on War Claims of the House, or transmitted to Congress. If I remember correctly, that is the wording of the law; and they are pending now before Congress and have never had the slightest adjudication on this earth. The Southern Claims Commission did not touch them. It did not have time to do it. It did consider a great many; allowed some and rejected many more. Now, under the Bowman Act it is provided that these claims may go to the Court of Claims.

Mr. DINGLEY. For a determination or finding of fact?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have the law here and I will ask the Clerk to read it in order that there may be no misunderstanding.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

SEC. 2. That when a claim or matter is pending in any of the Executive Departments which may involve controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said court, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report its findings and opinions to the Department by which it was transmitted for its guidance and action.

SEC. 3. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

SEC. 4. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact; and unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same were taken as aforesaid, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war, the court shall not have jurisdiction of such cause, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed.

SEC. 5. That the Attorney-General, or his assistants, under his direction, shall appear for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States in all cases which may be transmitted to the Court of Claims under this act, with the same power to interpose counterclaims, offsets, defenses for fraud practiced or attempted to be practiced by claimants, and other defenses, in like manner as he is now required to defend the United States in said court.

SEC. 6. That in the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he or she is a party to or interested in the same.

SEC. 7. That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the gentleman from Maine. I wanted to have that statute read as a part of my remarks, because I wanted to comment on it for a moment. I want to ask the attention of the members of this House to it. I assert here, Mr. Chairman, that there is not a class of claims against this Government that has ever been treated more unfairly than these findings of the Court of Claims under this very act. The gentleman from Maine makes the point that these claims here are barred or have been barred at one time or other by the statute. He will find a reservation in this law against all such claims as those he referred to.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not by the statute of limitations.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, well, barred in anyway. If they are barred the Court of Claims can not consider them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I want to emphasize is this fact—that these claims have been referred to the court under this act for years in order to relieve Congress and the Departments by having these questions taken out of Congress and from the different Departments and sent to a competent court where they could be investigated by a judicial tribunal. I say that was the object of the law.

Now, what is the practice? Remember this law provides that when they go there they shall be defended by the Attorney-General or an Assistant Attorney-General of the United States. They appear there, the claimant, with his counsel, on one side and the Attorney-General on the other. Now, they have that investigation, which I have just described, which is twofold in its character. First, to ascertain that the claimant was loyal. If he was not loyal—and, Mr. Chairman, it means loyal throughout the war, as you very well know. It is not a case where he came into the county seat and took the oath of allegiance while the war was going on, but he must prove affirmatively that he was loyal throughout the war; and if he was disloyal at any time he can not prosecute his claim under this act. Then, when this court of five Republican judges find affirmatively that the claimant has been loyal throughout the war, the only question it seems to me is, Has his property been taken and used by the United States Army to keep the United States Army alive during the war? That is the next question. When that finding is had, it is certified to Congress.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that these cases have been referred for the past four years and that there are to-day bills carrying over $900,000 of just such claims on which the findings have been favorable by this Republican Court of Claims. The claimant is proved to have been loyal and the property taken and used by the United States Army, and yet Congress refuses to appropriate one dollar. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that when I say this I do not mean that my reflection, if it be a reflection, shall rest upon this House simply. I want to state as a fact that the Fifty-third Congress, when the party to which I belong had control in the House of Representatives, did not pay these claims. I want to state that the Fifty-second Congress, when the same party had control of the House, did not pay these claims; but the Fifty-first Congress, when your party, sir, was in power, did pay $548,000 of these findings. The bill passed nem. con. It was taken up by unanimous consent on the last day of Congress, and it passed this House unanimously, without a dissenting voice.

Now, is it not strange that in this Republican House we can get no justice done to this class of claimants, South and North—because many of them lived in the border States, some of them in the North? I insist, Mr. Chairman, that I had the right to make the contention I made. I insisted that we ought to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering these bills. I did not ask any advantage. I asked that they be taken up in their regular order as they have been reported by the committees of this House. The Chair declined to hear any discussion on the resolution—I will not say improperly—and there was no opportunity offered until this moment for gentlemen on this side of the House, or gentlemen who voted as we did, to say a word in favor of this contention, why we favored taking up and considering these claims, that are just claims, now piling up on the Speaker's desk until they amount to something over $900,000. Now I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. OTJEN. The gentleman has practically answered my question in stating that the last Congress paid none of these claims.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true.

Mr. OTJEN. Although he says they are just.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is true. I have nothing to conceal. I find no reason to justify this Congrees in its course, if they are just. I want to say another thing, Mr. Chairman. No man, in my judgment, will vote against these claims when they are considered, but they will filibuster them out of the way, and they will not decide the motions that put them out of the way are dilatory, but the motion that makes them proper to be considered and brings them before us is a dilatory motion, possibly. I say this in justice to these claimants.

Now, further, upon the subject of the claims, Mr. Chairman, I assert that it is true, and I assert it upon information which I do not for one moment doubt, that there have been referred and passed upon by this Court of Claims claims aggregating in amount somewhere in the neighborhood of $15,000,000 to $18,000.000. Think about it for a moment. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], whom I recognize as a legislator of long experience, of great ability, and of perfect and absolute honesty, undertakes to cast a slur upon this class of claims. I want to tell him a fact, which I think it likely he knows, but it will do no harm to repeat it here, that of the fifteen or eighteen million dollars of these claims that have been considered by the Court of Claims about 92 per cent have been rejected. Ninety-two per cent of these claims have been disallowed by the court and finally laid to sleep, and the little 7 or 8 per cent that have been passed upon favorably, that have gone through all the intricacies of the law and through all the difficult processes of that court, that have had a light equal to the cathode ray thrown upon them until you could see not only the outside of the claims but part of the way through and all the way through—the 7 or 8 per cent of these claims that have been found just and honest—are all that we are asked to pay.

Now, sir, I undertake to say that there never was a court or a tribunal of any kind appointed to investigate any class of claims which, if it allowed anything, allowed a smaller per cent than the Court of Claims has allowed of the class of cases which my friend from Maine attempts to discredit. It is for that 7 or 8 per cent of these claims found to be well founded and honest that I speak. I see the chairman of the Committee on War Claims present, and I have no doubt that he will sustain me as to the facts that I have attempted to state here. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that these claims ought to be paid now, and they ought to be paid by this Congress. We have already kept the claimants out of their money for more than thirty years. We pay them no interest. First we reject through the court 92 per cent of these claims, and then the others that are not rejected are sent to Congress, but it is impossible to get Congress to pay them.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the facts, poorly expressed, that have led me to make the effort I have made to-day to have one hour or one day devoted to the consideration of these just claims. Already a resolution has been introduced to adjourn this Congress. It seems that in about one more moon we shall return to our homes, having done nothing but pass the appropriation bills. We could have done that by the 4th of March; we do it every alternate year. We could have passed the appropriation bills by the 4th of March and have gone home, and that is all that we are doing or that we are to do. It is announced that we are to do nothing else. We are told that we are here for nothing except to pass the appropriation bills and go home, and it is manifest that that is about all we shall do. But, Mr. Chairman, in justice to these claimants of whom I have spoken, in justice to these men who have been found to be loyal men, these men as to whom five Republican judges have told us that their property was taken and used by the United States Army, I do make an appeal.

The bills to provide for paying this class of claims ought to be passed. Understand, Mr. Chairman, that that court does not pass upon claims for occupation of property in the rebel territory by the Army of the United States. That court was not authorized to investigate claims for damages to property. Even if the property of loyal men was damaged, that court has no jurisdiction over such claims. These claims, therefore, are all for property actually consumed by the Army of the United States as a means of maintaining itself while it was in that section of the country.

I have said this much because I felt that so much ought to be said on behalf of this worthy class of claimants. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, some of the gentlemen who have been asked whether they were opposed to this bill have hesitated to answer. I do not hesitate to answer. I am opposed to this bill and I am opposed to every measure of this kind. Not that I am opposed to every bill for private relief. I propose to consider every bill on its own merits, but I am opposed to any bill which proposes to reverse the decision of a court-martial made and carried into effect thirty-two years ago, and I am opposed to any bill which puts the seal of the approval of the House of Representatives of the United States upon that which is a crime under the laws of all civilized countries. Do you care to go on record, gentlemen, as in favor of murder, as in favor of that form of homicide which is embraced in the term "dueling"? You may vote in favor of this bill because we are now in Committee of the Whole and no record can be taken of your votes, but I venture to say that if your names could be placed upon the roll call you would not dare to go before the people of this country, or before the people of your several districts, as voting in favor of an indorsement of an admitted crime.

What does this bill propose to do? It proposes, in substance, to reverse the decision of a court-martial which took effect in the year 1864, and to restore Major Grebe to his position on the register of the Army and thus to give him an honorable discharge. For what purpose? Not for purposes of pay and allowance, but for the purpose, undoubtedly, of securing for him hereafter a pension from the Government of the United States. Now, even if the gentleman who introduced this bill or the gentleman who moved its consideration would consent to an amendment providing that no pension should be granted to this claimant, I should still be opposed to the measure. For what reason? Because it would be a declaration by this body—it would be a declaration by the more popular branch of the Federal Legislature—that, as legislators, we believed in the justice and propriety of duelling; that we thought it was right. You gentlemen of the majority were very eager the other day when a bill was brought in from the Judiciary Committee to stop a prize fight—in many aspects a somewhat noble amusement, incomparably more noble than going out with sword or pistol to deprive your adversary of his life—you were very eager, I say, to pass that bill. Yet, what was at stake there? Simply the question whether Fitzsimmons or Maher should be knocked out in a few rounds, and yet the Congress of the United States rushed in and hurried that bill through in order that the prize fight might be, not stopped, but that it might be fought under the protection of Texan rangers in the territory of Mexico. [Laughter.] Yet now you come here and say, practically, that while a prize fight is very criminal, is very wrong, is very immoral, a duel, in which each party seeks to kill the other, is not only a proper but an eminently Christian amusement.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to go a little slow before we pass bills of this character involving a moral or an immoral declaration, as this would be. Dueling was all very well in the Middle Ages; it was all very well in the time of Charles II; it was all very well for the courtiers and rakes in the time of the four Georges; but is it the right and proper thing for legislators, in a constitutional Government like ours, at the end of the nineteenth century, to set the seal of our approbation upon such acts? I say, gentlemen, God forbid!

But before I go on further to discuss the question of dueling let me indicate to you some of the peculiar features of this case. Was this man convicted unjustly? Was he not, according to the record, convicted on his own confession? Did he not, as a matter of fact, interpose a plea of guilty to the charge of dueling? Here we find three captains of the Fourth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry while in our service in war time deliberately taking part in a duel, when these officers had taken the oath on entering the Federal service to comply with the rules and regulations of war and knew every obligation that thus became incumbent upon them. They knew at the time of taking the oath that the Articles of War, article 26, provided as follows:

> No officer or soldier shall send a challenge to another officer or soldier to fight a duel or accept a challenge so sent. Any officer who so offends shall be dismissed from the service. Any soldier who so offends shall suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

Now, these three captains in that Missouri regiment, having been detected in the infraction of the Articles of War and of the Revised Statutes of the United States, having committed that which was a crime not only under the Federal law but which is also against the statutes of every one of the States, and having been, I say, detected in the offense, were arraigned before a general court-martial, and the three officers pleaded guilty to the offense, and were finally dismissed from the service of the United States. I do not believe, therefore, as a matter of precedent, that we have a right to come in here, over thirty years after the war has ended, and reverse tne deliberate findings of a court-martial when those findings have been approved by the commanding general of the department and the officers who were familiar with the facts at the time of their occurrence.

But what is the other objection to this bill? After dueling has ceased in the United States of America it is now proposed that this body shall solemnly declare that dueling in reality is no offense.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. I think our position is this: That this man was fresh from another country where dueling was permitted and had been challenged by a man in our country, and, being a stranger and new to the country, he felt that it would be dishonorable in him and that his actions might lead to misconstruction if he refused to accept the challenge and fight the duel, and, consequently, in violation of the law, he accepted the challenge. Now, as he was a brave soldier, as these things occurred thirty years ago, as the gentleman himself has said, while we do not say that dueling is right, yet we are willing to forgive. That is my position, at least.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The answer to the gentleman from Indiana is that such an excuse is hardly a plausible one. It may be to one unacquainted with the laws of European countries somewhat a specious excuse, but to anyone who is familiar with the criminal laws and statutes of European countries its falsity must be at once manifest. If these officers made such an excuse, it could not have been made in good faith; for, whatever may be said of the practice of dueling in France and other countries, it is certain that ever since the time of the great Frederick dueling among officers of the army in Prussia and in the German army has received the severest condemnation by law and statute. You all remember that Frederick the Great was against dueling, although the spirit of his time was in favor of it, and that when an officer came to him—an officer with whom he was friendly and intimate—and told him that he must accept a challenge to fight a duel, the great king said, "Yes, you can fight your duel." But when the morning came they found upon the dueling ground a scaffold erected. And they asked, "For what purpose is that erected"? The answer given to them was "Whoever survives the duel shall be hanged on the spot!" And yet we are told that in Schleswig-Holstein dueling was permitted in 1864. I ask any gentleman who makes that assertion to produce the law which governs Schleswig-Holstein in this matter, and which authorizes and permits anyone, or any officer in the service of that country, to take part in a duel or to send or accept a challenge.

Mr. STEELE. You will have to send for somebody to read the law even if I had it, if it is in German. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Well, I could read it if it is in German.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman has been referring to the law of Schleswig-Holstein as prohibiting dueling. It is not to be presumed, I suppose, that we are in the habit of keeping the statutes governing that country in our desks for convenient reference; but as the gentleman has made the suggestion he did, and as I have broken my glasses and can not read the article myself, I send to the desk and ask to have read a brief newspaper extract referring to a duel fought by a naval officer on yesterday who is connected with the German navy.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I can not yield for the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. What is it that the gentleman desires to have read?

Mr. GARDNER. A brief account of a duel fought by a German naval officer.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. That may be true, but it does not prove that there was any statute permitting dueling or that there was not a statute inhibiting it in Schleswig-Holstein in 1864.

Mr. GARDNER. All this proves is that the habit prevails in the army of Germany and among German-speaking people, and I simply want to say that the correctness of that belief is confirmed by a dispatch in the New Jersey State Gazette of this morning, containing an account of a duel fought on(y yesterday.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, this interruption of the gentleman from New Jersey is very interesting, but the authority of an account in a New Jersey newspaper could hardly be taken in the same light as an extract from the statute books.

Mr. GARDNER. I should like to read this.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I must decline to yield for that.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I yield.

Mr. BLUE. This committee report, if I remember it correctly, states in the portion pertaining to the court-martial that these officers, who were educated men, military men educated abroad, and who were doubtless familiar with the law, say that it was permissible there. I think that the burden of proof is on the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] to show that there is any law there that prohibits it, especially when he sets up his mere ipse dixit against what they say about it. They may be presumed to have knowledge and information on the subject.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I will venture to assert that dueling among officers of the army is illegal in every country in Europe and that it is punishable as a crime in every country.

Mr. BLUE. Cite your authority.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. And that it is punishable in every army there by cashiering or dismissal from the service.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Oh, I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. GROW. Does the gentleman yield for my question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. If it is not an argument on the tariff, or on the President, I will yield.

Mr. GROW. That is all right. There was a time when there was a law of Congress prohibiting dueling, and I think there is still such a law. Yet in my experience a good many gentlemen have gone out of these halls to fight duels.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I presume that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania is still in favor of the practice, but I think it would be rather unfortunate. I do not think it has ever led to any good in this country, and I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who believes in dueling, to this somewhat tragic account of the Broderick-Terry duel——

Mr. GROW. I hope the gentleman will allow me to correct his statement. I do not believe in dueling. When challenged once, I rejected it on that ground.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not vote in favor of this bill, which is in essence an approval of the system of dueling.

Mr. GROW. Oh, dueling has gone out with slavery. But my point was to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that although there was a law of Congress prohibiting members of Congress from dueling, yet just as honorable gentlemen as any on the floor to-day used to accept challenges and fight duels.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Of course, if there is a general feeling in the Congress of the United States in favor of this form of murder known as dueling, then let us declare that it is all right. Let every State repeal its statute against dueling. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks that dueling is a good thing, let him cast his eyes down the bloody record during the early part of this century. Let him recollect that in every State it has been made the object of general execration. Why? Because it led to so many inexcusable and wanton homicides. Now, if it were a general rule to settle all disputes by resort to dueling it would be perfectly agreeable to me, although it would necessarily take up a large part of that time which we ordinarily devote to public business. Now let us see what is the history of the practice of dueling in this country? I will ask the Chairman how much time I have?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Was I recognized in my own right?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was recognized in the time of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. There is one statement in conclusion to which I wish to call the attention of the committee, and it is this evasive statement contained in the report as to Executive authority:

> The application for reinstatement was denied, not on account of want of merit in the application, but on account of want of Executive authority.

Did the committee mean to state that the President of the United States, the Chief Executive, had no power to pardon Major Grebe for the offense committed? Does not the Constitution, in Article II, give the express power of pardon to the President of the United States? And why was not the application for Executive clemency made to the President of the United States?

If there had been any circumstances which would have entitled the applicant to favorable consideration, will it for one moment be asserted that the President of the United States would not have pardoned this offender? It is, I apprehend, gentlemen, because there is some more sinister motive back of this than to clear the record of this soldier. I believe it is to entitle him to a pension, to which he is not entitled. Why? Because, in the first place, he had committed an offense, or crime, under the Articles of War; because, in the second place, he had been convicted by a general court-martial, and the sentence and finding of that general court-martial has never been reversed or set aside.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I am not here to argue the justice or injustice of the dueling code or laws or anything of that kind. I am not here to argue the justice of the war claims, on which the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] had so much to say in his eloquent remarks. Notwithstanding the fact, sir, of the doubtful way, the roundabout way, and the questionable way in which the majority of this House succeeded in getting into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of these private claims, and the way in which they took advantage of some of those who voted for it after getting into Committee of the Whole to bring up only pension claims, notwithstanding the fact of the apparent arbitrary ruling of the Chair and his refusal to entertain motions, I stand here and say that I for one am in favor of the bill before the committee at present.

In the first place, I am in favor of granting relief to this distinguished soldier, because the evidence shows, and it is voluminous, that he was a good soldier, that he was a brave soldier, and that he was a true soldier, fighting for what he honestly thought was right, coming from the Old World and doing his duty, and the only charge against him is that, having been insulted, he possibly agreed to fight a duel with some officer. The evidence does not go on to show whether he really fought a duel or not; but it does show that he was challenged and accepted the challenge. For that he was dismissed in a dishonorable manner from the Army; and now, after thirty years, there is no reason why this simple request should not be granted to this gallant, true Union soldier. The evidence shows that as an officer of the Army he was always at his post and secured the complimentary notice and praise of all his commanding officers. Consequently I shall vote to-day for this brave soldier, to have the order of the court-martial revoked, for that is all he asks.

In the second place, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for it because this claim was favorably reported by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Tarsney, from the same State, and whose seat seems now to be vacant. I will vote for it, in the next place—and I hope the gentlemen on this side, especially from the South, will vote for it—to show that we can do justice to a brave soldier against whom there is no charge of unsoldierly conduct. If this man had been charged with desertion, or if it was a charge of being a "bum" or a "coffee cooler," I should raise my voice against his request; but as it is, he stands without a single stigma against his record as a soldier; and I hope every man on this floor will vote for this man, especially men from the South, for the special purpose of showing to gentlemen on the other side of the House that we stand ready to take up every case and do justice toward brave soldiers who fought for the side which they considered right.

Let it be a contrast to the treatment that you gave to that distinguished Union soldier, Mr. Tarsney, when you refused him an opportunity to reopen his case and bring out more evidence and let him bring in new evidence which had been discovered after the case was closed. Let it be in contrast to your conduct in kicking him out of his seat without giving him a chance to bring in new evidence which had been found and which he wanted to introduce. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us show that we stand ready to do justice to the brave soldiers, whether they fought on the one side or the other. Let us show that we will always recognize and always commemorate the merits of brave soldiers as becomes a people who commemorate deeds of valor in song and in story, and let us make an effort in this case, Mr. Chairman, to obliterate and do away with the only soldier in both armies, it seems, who now wants to fight the war over. I allude to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], and after we have thrown down this last soldier, then, in the language of General Grant, "Let us have peace." [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I want to occupy the time of the House for about five minutes on this case. Inasmuch as my colleague [Mr. BARTLETT of New York] has alluded to the fact that as we are in Committee of the Whole no record of our vote on this measure can be obtained, I want to say that I am going on record in favor of this bill.

It is not a question of the propriety of dueling. The statutes of most of the States have pronounced against that. It seems to me that we can look back with a great deal of charity upon the act of a man who came all the way from Norway in the time of our troubles to fight for the Union. He came as a volunteer from that country, and offered his service to us in our time of peril. He was in the act of defending his own honor and the honor, perhaps, of a lady who was with him, and was compelled by a citizen of our own country, who should have known our laws, who had done him an injustice, and who had challenged him—compelled by every rule of honor, every characteristic of a gentleman, to accept that challenge. He pleaded nothing in extenuation of his act, but went before the court-martial and stated the facts to the court, and the history is presented here as it actually occurred. He accepted the verdict without complaint; and as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BLUE] said, that court-martial immediately afterwards unanimously recommended the wiping out of this stain that they had placed upon him and stated in that recommendation that they did so on account of the mitigating circumstances presented in the case. I say, irrespective of the manner in which the bill is brought before this House, irrespective of the question of whether dueling is proper or improper, this man has shown himself an honorable, brave soldier and true gentleman, and he deserves at the hands of this House the vote of every honorable man and every gentleman. [Applause.]

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAN S. PLACE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 951) to amend the military record of Dan S. Place, first lieutenant, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the military record of Dan S. Place so as to show him honorably discharged from the service as first lieutenant, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. TRACEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 951) to amend the military record of Daniel S. Place, first lieutenant, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers, have carefully considered the same and the papers pertaining thereto, and report:

Daniel S. Place was enrolled as a private in Company G, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers, July 27, 1861, and was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant for meritorious conduct, to date April 23, 1863. He was severely wounded and partially disabled in action at Port Gibson, May 1, 1863. While convalescing was ordered on light duty at New Orleans, where he remained until September, 1864, and was placed on detached duty at Elmira, N. Y., by special orders from the War Department, dated October 29, 1864.

While serving at Elmira, on duty at Prison Camp, he was charged with "conduct prejudicial to good order and discipline" and "conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman," the specification being that he did, contrary to orders, carry out and mail letters for prisoners of war confined in the camp.

He was found guilty of the offense charged by a court-martial, but as the letters were shown to be of purely social character and contained nothing of importance, the sentence of the court was out of all proportion to the offense, in that it sentenced him to be cashiered the service and forever prohibited from holding any office of trust or emolument under the United States Government; that his sword be broken by a noncommissioned officer, his straps taken from his shoulders, and his buttons cut from his coat in the presence of the troops of the command.

The latter part of the sentence, requiring his personal degradation in the presence of the troops of the command, was disapproved by Bvt. Brig. Gen. A. S. Devier, commanding the military district of New York.

On March 15, 1865, the case was reopened at the instance of Senator Henry S. Lane, of Indiana, and a lengthy report made and filed by the Acting Judge-Advocate-General of the Army, in which, among other things, he says:

"It is not believed that he should be disfranchised, and as he is represented to be a man of good character and undoubtedly loyal, the interests of the service would justify a removal of all disability in order to enable him to reenter the service if the governor of the State sees proper to commission him."

Upon this report, by direction of the President, the disability to reenter the service was removed.

There remains, therefore, against Lieutenant Place nothing of the original sentence save the dismissal from the Army, which, in view of his established loyalty before and after the offense charged, the trivial character of the offense itself, viewed in the light of the facts submitted to the Judge-Advocate-General upon the reopening of the case, his brave, efficient, and faithful services as a soldier, his high character and standing as a citizen during the thirty years that have passed since the war, your committee believe ought to be removed. Your committee do not discredit the necessity for the maintenance of military discipline, which it is conceded involves exact obedience to orders, but it believes the highest demands of such discipline have been more than met by the punishment already inflicted.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill favorably and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER] is in charge of this bill, and I would like to hear a brief explanation of it.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced by me because the family of Mr. Place—that is, his wife and daughter—live in my district in Florida. Mr. Place went there after the war on account of the loss of health, which I understand was largely due to a wound received in active service in the Union Army. He went into the Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers as a private. He was promoted to a lieutenantcy for gallant conduct in the field. He was severely wounded at Fort Gibson and was invalided. While convalescing he was detailed to duty at the military prison at Elmira, N. Y. There he had in his service, as was customary among officers at the military prisons, a Confederate prisoner who acted as his secretary. This prisoner was corresponding with some ladies at home. The prison rules had been so changed that all letters written by prisoners had to go through the hands of a Confederate detail before they were mailed, and those fellow-prisoners would write upon the margin of the secretary's letters addressed to these ladies things that were unpleasant for him to have go upon his letters through the mails. I knew Mr. Place in his lifetime. He was as generous-hearted a man as ever lived. The secretary asked him if he would not mail some letters for him to his ladycorrespondents.

Mr. Place always claimed that he did not know there was any regulation against it, and he said that if the letters were handed to him open, so that he could see there was nothing contraband about them, he would mail them to the ladies, and he did so. He was arraigned on the charge of mailing the letters of prisoners. It was admitted that there was nothing contraband in the letters; his loyalty was never questioned; he was at that prison doing duty because he was suffering from wounds received in the field. He was invalided at the time, and, in fact, he never did recover his health. Later he went to Florida and died of disabilities received in the Union service. The court-martial dealt with him with wonderful severity; with such remarkable severity that, looking back, it is difficult to understand it. They sentenced him to be cashiered from the Army; they ordered that the sword which he had won by gallant conduct in the field should be taken away from him; that the buttons should be cut from his uniform, and that he should be degraded. That sentence went up to a superior tribunal. They struck out all those things which imposed personal degradation, on the ground that he had been a gallant and loyal soldier and did not deserve such punishment.

The sentence in that form went to the War Department. The Department amended it again by writing on it that, owing to the meritorious military record of this officer and his loyalty, while he should stand dismissed, he should be entitled to enter the Army again and to receive a commission. The State of Indiana gave him an honorable discharge. Later he went to Florida, where he was as good and useful a citizen as any man I ever knew. What his politics were I do not know. I do know that he died very largely as the result of wounds received in service in the field. He had been a gallant soldier of the Union. He had been promoted for meritorious conduct. He suffered to the end of his days from the wounds which he had received in battle, and he left a wife and daughter, who not only desire that his memory shall be relieved from this stigma, but who, I am free to say, are in exceedingly narrow circumstances, and if they should be entitled to any relief, by way of pension or otherwise upon application in due course before the Department, I desire that they shall have an opportunity to present their just claim. That, gentlemen, is the case, and I think it is one that appeals to the House.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEN. WILLIAM P. CARLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 422) for the relief of Brig. Gen. William P. Carlin, retired.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Brig. Gen. William P. Carlin, retired, be, and he is hereby, relieved and discharged from any and all liability for the amount of $1,108.85, expended by Capt. J. McE. Hyde, assistant quartermaster, by his direction, while in command of the Department of Columbia, for expenses incurred in the search for and rescue of a party of citizens lost among the Bitter Root Mountains in a great snowstorm in the autumn of 1893.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. PARKER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 422) for the relief of Brig. Gen. William P. Carlin, retired, would report:

This is a bill to relieve General Carlin from liability for $1,108.85, expended by Captain Hyde, assistant quartermaster, under his direction, while in command of the Department of the Columbia, for expenses incurred in the search for and rescue of a party of citizens lost among the Bitter Root Mountains in a great snowstorm in the autumn of 1893.

The party went into a region inaccessible except in summer. Snows set in early. The party were reported snowed in, and would certainly have perished had not General Carlin ordered relief expeditions, who had to spend money for guides, snowshoes, toboggans, moccasins, etc. The party was rescued, but the sum so paid was charged to the General. After two hearings in the War Department, it has been decided that it can not be allowed under existing laws.

General Schofield, in a report on this matter to the Secretary of War, well states the custom of the Army to respond promptly, without orders, to all demands of humanity, wherever fire, flood, or other disaster has overtaken any part of the people, and especially where adventurous pioneers have incurred unusual dangers from which the troops alone were in position to rescue them. He further states that the use of Government property in such service has always been accepted as a matter of course, but that where the necessities of the service involve the purchase of supplies not provided by the Army it is more doubtful. He continues:

"If it is considered within the limits of administrative discretion to approve the purchases made in this case, I recommend that it be done. If not, I respectfully suggest that the matter be brought to the attention of Congress, in order that a bill providing the necessary relief may be passed."

The committee concur in this view, and recommend the passage of the bill.

General Carlin's son was one of five in the lost party. General Carlin has, however, spent over $1,400 in other expenses connected with the search for the party, for which he has not asked repayment as not being purely military, and we are of opinion that he should not bear the sum provided for in this bill, which was expended in what we deem a necessary and proper use of the Army in case of urgent need. Public policy demands that no officer should suffer for army expenses incurred in prompt and successful answer to the call of humanity.

The facts appear in the petition, letters, and brief of the War Department, which are appended.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 23, 1894.

The undersigned, a brigadier-general in the Army of the United States on the retired list since November 24, 1893, respectfully appeals to Congress for relief under the circumstances and facts stated below:

In June, 1893, he was by order of the President of the United States assigned to the command of the Military Department of the Columbia, including the States of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, and the Territory of Alaska, with headquarters at Vancouver Barracks, Wash. The troops of the United States in said department were under his command and, of course, subject to his lawful orders.

In the month of September, 1893, a party of five men left Spokane, Wash., on a hunting expedition in the spurs of the Bitter Root Mountains embraced by the branches of Clearwater River, in Idaho. The region designated is uninhabited and inaccessible, except in summer time. It was passed over by Lewis and Clarke, the great explorers, on their way to Columbia River in the year 1806, but was so rugged and inhospitable that they came near perishing, and would have perished but for the kindness of the Indians west of the mountains.

In the year 1893 the rainy season set in unusually early, and in September the high mountains and ridges were covered with snow.

Nothing was heard of the party of hunters after they left Spokane on the 18th of September by any of their acquaintances or friends till November 25, 1893. But on the 7th of November, 1893, a telegram was sent to me from Spokane saying that it was rumored that they had been snowed in and could not get out without help. This report becoming known to the officers at Vancouver Barracks excited great sympathy among them, and one of them, Lieut. Charles P. Elliott, Fourth United States Cavalry, came to me and asked me to order him out with a party of men of his troop to go in search of the lost party of citizens. I complied with his request and gave the necessary instructions for the movement of the detachment and for supplying them on their march. Subsequently I ordered out two small parties under command of Lieut. Clough Overton, Fourth United States Cavalry, and Lieutenant Voorhies, Fourth Cavalry. I also requested by telegram that the Major General Commanding the Army direct the general commanding the Department of Dakota to send a party from Fort Missoula, Mont. Major-General Schofield complied with this request and the party was sent by General Merritt, commanding the Department of Dakota.

In order to penetrate so rough and unknown a region, the officers in command of the parties ordered out to search for the men supposed to be perishing, or possibly murdered by Indians, it was necessary for them to hire civilians as guides and packers to build boats and to buy snowshoes, toboggans, forage, food for men, and to pay the prices of that region. When I ordered the movements of the troops stated above, I reported the facts by telegraph to the Adjutant-General for the information of the Major-General Commanding the Army and the Secretary of War, and requested the approval of my action. No direct reply was received, but from the subsequent action of the Major-General Commanding I inferred that my action was approved, or at least not disapproved.

The date of my retirement for age under the law was close at hand, and before that date I issued orders directing that all vouchers approved by officers sent out by my orders should be paid by the disbursing officers of my command.

On the 24th of November, 1893, I was retired by the operation of law. No news of the lost party had been received. The Department had been placed under command of General Ruger, then at San Francisco, Cal. On the 25th of November, the day after my retirement, I received a dispatch from Lieutenant Elliott saying that he had found the lost party on November 22, 1893, except one who was lost. It required nearly three days for this dispatch to reach me.

In the settlement of the accounts of Captain Hyde, the quartermaster at Vancouver Barracks, the Quartermaster-General United States Army, suspended vouchers to the amount of $1,108.85 against him. Captain Hyde wrote the facts to me, and I suggested that he had only obeyed my orders in paying these vouchers, and that he could have the responsibility transferred to me. This has since been done on the recommendation of the Quartermaster-General, approved by the Secretary of War.

The letter of the Quartermaster-General, indorsed by the Acting Judge-Advocate-General, the Major-General Commanding the Army, and the Secretary of War, is attached hereto. Your special attention is respectfully invited to the letter and indorsements. The Acting Judge-Advocate-General remarks that as it does not appear that General Carlin had any authority to order the payment of the expenditures, that he be held responsible. The opinion of the Major-General Commanding the Army justifies my action in this matter. I was placed in command of the troops and department by lawful orders of the President, and I hold that the authority I exercised was legitimate by long-continued custom in the Army, and that the expenditures were necessary to the success of the expedition. These men were in the greatest possible peril. They were exhausted by starvation and exposure when met by Lieutenant Elliott, and it is doubtful if any of them would have escaped alive if Lieutenant Elliott had not met them.

In addition to the sum of money for which I am held responsible by the Quartermaster-General and War Department, I paid out of my own pocket the following items on account of the search for the party of snow-bound citizens:

As reward to Lieut. C. P. Elliott, Fourth United States Cavalry, which he divided among his men	$500.00
To Lieut. C. Overton, Fourth Cavalry, to reimburse men for clothing worn out or lost	63.25
To W. H. Wright as guide to the Missoula party	250.00
To party of citizens at Missoula for preparing to search for the lost party	20.00
Other expenses for the party of hunters	550.00
Personal expenses for traveling, telegraphing, etc	50.00
Total	1,433.25

WILLIAM P. CARLIN,
Brigadier-General (Retired).

EBBITT HOUSE, Washington, D. C., November 26, 1894.

Since writing the above the Quartermaster-General has notified me of the suspension of two accounts paid by Capt. C. A. McCauley, quartermaster, and that the amount thereof, $42.82, has been charged against me. The total thus charged against me is $1,151.67, which amount he has requested me to deposit to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.

WILLIAM P. CARLIN,
Brigadier-General United States Army (Retired).

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1894.

SIR: In the money accounts of Capt. J. McE. Hyde, assistant quartermaster, rendered from Vancouver Barracks, Wash., for the months of November and December, 1893, various expenditures appear on account of a relief party dispatched to the Clearwater River region, Idaho, under orders of Brig. Gen. W. P. Carlin, commanding Department of the Columbia, for the rescue of a party of hunters, citizens (among them a son of General Carlin), lost among the Bitter Root Mountains in a great snowstorm in the late autumn of 1893.

In the examination of these vouchers in this office disallowances to the amount of $1,108.85 were made—mainly for purchase of snowshoes, toboggans, moccasins, rubber boots, etc., reimbursement of expenses, services of boatmen, packers, guides and couriers, and hire of transportation at excessive rates. An abstract of these vouchers is submitted herewith, together with Captain Hyde's reply to the remarks of this office disallowing the expenditures as not a proper charge against the appropriations of the Quartermaster's Department. Captain Hyde explains that he paid the vouchers because he was ordered to do so by the department commander, whose approval appears on the vouchers. He adds that the officers who incurred the expenses were acting under a formal military order, and that the expenditures were absolutely necessary for the successful accomplishment of the specific duty to be performed.

Captain Hyde also cites Army Regulations 737, as follows: "An officer shall have credit for an expenditure of money or property made in obedience to the order of his commanding officer. If the expenditure is disallowed it shall be charged to the officer who ordered it."

It is recommended that General Carlin be held responsible.

In the same accounts are other vouchers for expenditures, aggregating $466.67, which are involved in somewhat similar conditions, paid under the same authority, but not disallowed in this office, as they are mainly for forage for public animals and expenses necessarily incurred for troops in the field. They are enumerated in Captain Hyde's reply, and an abstract of the vouchers is submitted.

Very respectfully,

R. N. BATCHELDER,
Quartermaster-General United States Army.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

[First indorsement.]

To A. J. A. G.

[Second indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., September 22, 1894.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

Attention is invited to the statement of facts contained in the letter of the Quartermaster-General dated September 19, 1894. This recommendation that General Carlin be held responsible is concurred in, for the reason that it does not appear that he (General Carlin) had any authority to authorize the expenditures.

G. NORMAN LIEBER,
Acting Judge-Advocate-General.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, Washington, September 28, 1894.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

It has been the custom of the Army during all its long and arduous services in the wild portions of the country, and even in those more civilized and densely populated, to respond promptly without hesitation and without orders to all demands of humanity.

Wherever fire, flood, or other disaster has overtaken any part of the people of the United States available troops have always rushed to the rescue without hesitation as to personal risk or sacrifice involved, or without question as to the use of United States property in the performance of such acts of humanity. Such service has, of course, been most common in the mountainous countries, where adventurous pioneers and settlers have incurred unusual dangers, and have been exposed to great suffering and death, from which the troops alone were in position to rescue them.

The use of Government property in such service, including the issue of rations when necessary, has always been accepted as a matter of course, but where the necessities of the service involved the purchase of supplies not provided by the Quartermaster's and Subsistence departments of the Army, the matter assumes a new aspect. I am not aware whether such purchases have ever been made for such a purpose. If it is considered within the limits of administrative discretion to approve the purchases made in this case I recommend that it be done. If not, I respectfully suggest that the matter be brought to the attention of Congress, in order that a bill providing the necessary relief may be passed.

In respect to the purely official question of responsibility for the purchases made, of course the commanding general who ordered them is the responsible authority.

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Major-General Commanding.

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 3, 1894.

The recommendation of the Quartermaster-General, as concurred in by the Acting Judge-Advocate-General, that General Carlin be held responsible, is approved.

DANIEL S. LAMONT,
Secretary of War.

Respectfully returned to the Quartermaster-General, inviting attention to the orders of the Secretary of War indorsed hereon.

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Adjutant-General.

Respectfully furnished Brig. Gen. William P. Carlin, United States Army, for his information.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, November 8, 1894.

In September, 1894, the Quartermaster-General reported to the Secretary of War that in the money accounts of Captain Hyde, assistant quartermaster, various expenditures appeared on account of a relief party dispatched to the Clearwater River region, Idaho, under orders of General Carlin, the department commander, for the rescue of a party of citizen hunters lost among the Bitter Root Mountains in a great snowstorm in the autumn of 1893, and that in the examination of these vouchers the amount of $1,108.85 was disallowed, mainly for purchase of snowshoes, toboggans, moccasins, rubber boots, etc., reimbursement of expenses, services of boatmen, packers, guides and couriers, and hire of transportation at excessive rates; that in reply to remarks of the Quartermaster-General disallowing this expenditure, Captain Hyde explained that he paid the vouchers because he was ordered to do so by the department commander, and cited paragraph 737, Army Regulations, 1889: "An officer shall have credit for an expenditure of money or property made in obedience to the order of his commanding officer. If the expenditure is disallowed, it shall be charged to the officer who ordered it."

The Quartermaster-General recommended that General Carlin be held responsible. The Secretary of War, November 3, 1894, approved this recommendation, and November 9, 1894, General Carlin was advised accordingly. (9621 A. G. O., 1894.)

December 5, 1895, Brigadier-General Carlin requests a reconsideration of the action of the Department in holding him responsible for the expenditure by officers of the Quartermaster's Department on account of parties of troops sent out to relieve a party of citizens lost and snow-bound in the Bitter Root Mountains, Idaho, in November, 1893. He asks attention to paragraph 515, Army Regulations of 1895, which, he says, refers to such an emergency "involving loss of life," as the one which led to these expenditures, and also to other paragraphs prescribing the powers of department commanders, and states that last year a bill was introduced in the Senate for his relief, but he was advised to withdraw the same, which was done, although he is convinced that he erred in complying with this advice, and has taken steps to have a bill introduced in Congress directing that the vouchers be audited and allowed, but as the question is within the province of the Secretary of War, he prefers that the case should be decided by him, and therefore asks his approval.

December 4, 1894, a bill for the relief of General Carlin was introduced in the United States Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, but no further action seems to have been taken.

Referring to the previous correspondence on the subject, and to his letter of December 5, 1895, General Carlin was informed on December 14, 1895, by the Assistant Secretary of War, that after a careful reconsideration of the case the Department is constrained to adhere to its former decision in the premises, declining to approve the expenditure thus incurred.

January 16, 1896, the House Committee on Military Affairs transmits to the Secretary of War House bill No. 422, for the relief of General Carlin, discharging him from liability in the sum of $1,108.85, expended by his direction, while in command of the Department of the Columbia during the fall of 1893, in searching for citizens lost in a snowstorm, and requests that it be furnished with a record in this matter and an opinion whether the relief proposed is for the good of the service.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Idaho is interested in this bill, and I understood that there was an agreement between him and those advocating the bill that it should not be called up in his absence. He is not present at this time, and I therefore ask that the bill be passed over for the time being without prejudice.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, the agreement was that the friends of the bill would not call it up in the absence of the gentleman from Idaho; but the bill has been reached now in its regular order, and I do not see any reason why it should not be proceeded with.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I would suggest to the gentleman that when we went into the Committee of the Whole House to-day it was generally understood, I imagine, that we were going to begin with the beginning of the Calendar. It was not then understood that we were going to take up these bills in this order, and it was hardly expected that that bill would be reached. The gentleman did not expect the bill to come up now. Certainly I did not, and under the circumstances I would ask that it be not considered at this time.

Mr. HULL. I wish to state, in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Utah, that possibly I was the party that made the arrangement with Mr. WILSON. He had objected when I wanted to call the bill up at some former time by unanimous consent, but desired to be present, and that was all that he asked when the bill was taken up for consideration. The understanding was that the bill would not be taken up except when he was present, although the agreement went only to the fact of calling it up by unanimous consent. I am satisfied he left the Hall with the idea that this bill would not come up for consideration to-day; and in his absence I think it only right that the bill should go over.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa make that request?

Mr. HULL. I am not at liberty to make the request to the House——

Mr. CONNOLLY. I will ask that the bill go over, under the circumstances, without prejudice.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, retaining its place on the Calendar.

FRANK M. MARSHALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4510) for the appointment of Frank M. Marshall as lieutenant on the retired list of the Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Frank M. Marshall as a hospital steward, Hospital Corps, United States Army, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint said Frank M. Marshall a second lieutenant of cavalry in the United States Army, and to place him on the retired list with pay of the grade and increase on account of the length of service.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I ask the reading of the report in that case.

The report (by Mr. FENTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4510) for the appointment of Frank M. Marshall as a lieutenant on the retired list of the Army, having considered the same, report the bill back to the House with a recommendation that it do pass as amended.

The bill is amended by striking out the words "and directed," in the clause relating to the authorization of the President.

From among the many letters, official and otherwise, attesting the meritorious services of Frank M. Marshall through a long period of years of continuous enlistment, the following are appended:

"OFFICE OF THE ATTENDING SURGEON,
"UNITED STATES ARMY,
"Washington, D. C., December 5, 1886.

"SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the case of Hospital Steward F. M. Marshall, United States Army, stationed at this office, and to request that you take such action as will secure for him a compensation somewhat in proportion to his abilities and the responsible duties he performs. Prior to the passage of the act approved June 30, 1886, he received in monthly pay, commutation, etc., the sum of about $95 per month. On this, which was certainly not extravagant, he managed, with more or less difficulty, to live and take care of his family.

"Since the act referred to has taken effect he has $37.88 pay per month with fuel and one ration in kind and the rent of one room. This altogether amounts to less than the pay of a messenger in the general service and is clearly insufficient.

"Hospital Steward Marshall has served for over twenty-five years, is a competent pharmacist and an excellent clerk. He is a good mechanist, and keeps many of the instruments, etc., in order without extra cost to the Government. He makes the chemical and microscopical examinations required in carrying on the care of the sick. For these various occupations, involving a high degree of intelligence, he should be paid not less than $125 per month.

"I therefore submit to you the propriety of recommending the insertion in the forthcoming Army appropriation bill of a section fixing $125 per month as the pay of one hospital steward, to be designated by the Surgeon-General, and making the clause operative from the date of the passage of the bill.

"I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
"R. M. O'REILLY,
"Surgeon, U. S. A., Attending Surgeon.

"The SURGEON-GENERAL UNITED STATES ARMY."

On January 28, 1896, Dr. O'Reilly appeared before this committee in person and reiterated the substance of the foregoing letter.

The following extracts are from a letter addressed to a member of the Committee on Military Affairs by Surg. Gen. George M. Sternberg, United States Army:

"Mr. Marshall is a worthy man who has had long and faithful service as a hospital steward. He has been on duty at the Army dispensary in this city since October 5, 1865, and has been regarded by the medical officers under whom he has served as a most trustworthy and competent pharmacist. I should be glad to see him retired with the rank of a second lieutenant of cavalry, as provided by this bill. The only objection I see to the passage of this act is the fact that it will furnish a precedent for similar applications from other worthy men who have had long service as hospital stewards. It appears to me that it might be better to make some general provision for the retirement of hospital stewards who have served faithfully for thirty years or more which would provide more liberally for them than is done by the laws at present in force. If they could be given a retired pay equal to the retired pay of a second lieutenant of cavalry without conferring upon them the rank, it would perhaps be quite as satisfactory and on some accounts would be preferable."

In a letter addressed to Mr. Marshall under date of January 29, 1896, Col. F. C. Ainsworth, Chief of Record and Pension Office, War Department, says:

"Your long and faithful service in a position of great responsibility is certainly deserving of reward, and you have a right to expect that the officers of the Army who know how well you have discharged the duties imposed upon you should bear testimony in your behalf. I do not know of any enlisted man of the Army who has a stronger claim than you have for some such recognition as that proposed in the pending bill, and I hope that you may receive it."

It is evident from the foregoing record and personal testimony that Frank M. Marshall has not only performed faithful and honorable service from May 18, 1861, until the present time, but also that his service has been of a highly efficient and valuable nature, with which his rank and pay have been by no means commensurate. It is believed that there is no valid reason why he should not be retired with the rank and pay of a second lieutenant of cavalry.

Mr. PICKLER (during the reading of the report). I ask that the reading of the services of this soldier be omitted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. There is nothing to show why this bill should pass. The only possible reason is contained in the report of the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. I am not asking that the whole report be dispensed with, but ask that that part relating to the service of the soldier be not read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is part of the report. I have sent for the report and have been so far unable to get a copy of it.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I ask for the reading of the entire report.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report as above.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a very brief statement of this bill, which is now in the hands of my friend and colleague from Ohio [Mr. FENTON], who will explain fully its provisions to the committee.

This bill is a distinct departure from the general rule heretofore established, of conferring the rank of a commissioned officer of the Army on hospital stewards. Under the present law we have 112 hospital stewards. Under the law after this present fiscal year that number will gradually be reduced to 100.

This man has reenlisted at the different times and for the different periods under the law which are set forth in the report, which enlistments absolutely gave him no promise of ever becoming a second lieutenant. Personally, I should have preferred to see him receive, if necessary, a lump sum, rather than to increase the number of officers of the Army and gradually increase the retired list. But the committee decided to report it favorably, and I simply wish the committee now to understand the purport of the bill, which is a bill to give the rank of second lieutenant to a hospital steward, which will give him the rank and pay of such second lieutenant while on the active list and place him on the retired list as a second lieutenant. He is entitled, I will say, to be retired at any time.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa tell the committee the pay of a second lieutenant?

Mr. HULL. One hundred and twenty-five dollars a month.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman mean the retired pay or the active pay?

Mr. HULL. The active pay.

Mr. BAILEY. Then this man would be entitled to three-fourths of that when he goes on the retired list?

Mr. HULL. Yes; and it would entitle him also to purchase supplies from the Government at Government cost.

Mr. BAILEY. And he would be entitled to the additional 10 per cent for each five years of his service?

Mr. HULL. Well, that is a question in my mind whether he would be entitled to it or not. If he had the additional rank for every five years during the thirty-five years that he has spent in the service it would be a very considerable amount. But I think it would hardly cut any figure, as he is ready to be retired now, and the only question for the committee is to determine whether it will take a hospital steward and make him a commissioned officer in the Army. As I have said, it is unusual and entirely a departure from our practice heretofore in that regard.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, then, is opposed to that policy?

Mr. HULL. Personally, I am opposed to it. I think it is not a good policy for us to adopt. And yet this man has had a very exceptional service. There are circumstances which operate in this case which probably will never occur again.

But I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact (and the committee is able itself to decide this matter as well as I am) that this is taking a hospital steward and giving him a commission in the Army. Now, as I have said, the committee is competent to determine whether, after thirty-five years of service, a man who has held the position of a hospital steward all the time, who has been drawing full pay and allowances during that whole period, should become a commissioned officer at the expiration of the thirty-five years' service?

I will say to my friend from Texas that, personally, I would much prefer that we pass a law that whenever a hospital steward passes thirty-five years of service he should be commissioned. I think it would be better than making an exception, as in this case. But I only wanted the committee to understand the exact facts as they are presented here, and with that statement my opposition to the bill will cease.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of recommending to this House the passage of any such law?

Mr. HULL. That bill is not before us. I will answer that question when the bill comes up. Now, I do not want to take the time of the committee. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has the bill in charge and will give excellent reasons for its passage.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman a question. In reading this report I find the following:

> Prior to the passage of the act approved June 30, 1886, he received in monthly pay, commutation, etc., the sum of about $95 per month. On this, which was certainly not extravagant, he managed, with more or less difficulty, to live and take care of his family.
> Since the act referred to has taken effect he has $37.88 pay per month, with fuel and one ration in kind and the rent of one room.

Is that additional to the $95 per month?

Mr. HULL. No; it is in lieu of that. The pay of hospital stewards has been reduced, I will say to my friend from Illinois——

Mr. CANNON. What is the pay in dollars?

Mr. HULL. You have read it just there.

Mr. CANNON. With fuel and one ration in kind and the rent of one room?

Mr. HULL. The rent of the room is $12 a month.

Mr. CANNON. That statement does not convey much information to the ordinary man. It says "with fuel and one ration in kind and the rent of one room." I do not know why the pay of army officers was originally fixed in this way, unless it was so as not to let people know what they got; but when you figure it down in dollars and cents, what does he get?

Mr. HULL. You can not figure it down in dollars and cents, because if a man is out on the frontier and the Government furnishes him his rations, one ration in kind is about all one man will eat during a day. It includes beans, meat, coffee, rice, and such things as go to make up the army fare. So that you can not figure it in dollars and cents. If you were in the East you could probably buy the food for a great deal less than it would cost if you were out in Colorado, or Arizona, or Utah, or some of those Western States. His fuel would be whatever would be necessary to keep him comfortable in any kind of weather that he was exposed to.

Mr. CANNON. That is commuted, is it not?

Mr. HULL. Not necessarily.

Mr. CANNON. But it can be.

Mr. HULL. Not when a man is in active service. They only get 30 cents a day as commutation of rations, as I recollect it now.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that during many, many years this very worthy man—because I have no doubt he is worthy—has been on duty here in Washington?

Mr. HULL. The report does not state that.

Mr. CANNON. I want to know.

Mr. HULL. Yes; he has been on duty in Washington.

Mr. CROWTHER. Thirty cents a day is the commutation of rations.

Mr. CANNON. For how many years has he been in Washington?

Mr. HULL. For one or two enlistments. He has been a valuable man. I am not saying anything against him.

Mr. CANNON. I understand. He was so valuable, was he not, that he was on duty at the Surgeon-General's Office?

Mr. HULL. He was on duty in Washington.

Mr. CANNON. In the Surgeon-General's Office in Washington?

Mr. HULL. I will not undertake to answer that.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. HULL. He has been used wherever they have needed him. He has been detailed wherever he has been needed. The question as to where he has been on duty has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. CANNON. It has something to do with it when it comes to the question of addressing itself to the discretion of the House whether a man shall have exceptional legislation, whether he has been on the frontier taking his chances with others not so favored in the service, or whether he has, through several enlistments, been on duty in Washington, detailed down here in the Surgeon-General's Office. I do not know that he has. I never heard of him until within the last ten minutes; but we are entitled to frank statements as to the facts here.

Mr. HULL. I will say to my friend from Illinois that the gentleman from Ohio will give him all the information that he desires. My understanding is that he has been on duty in Washington for several years. If that is of any importance whatever, it is a reason for an increase of his pay, because on the frontier he would have nothing like the expense which he would be under in Washington. So that, so far as that is concerned, the only effect of it would be that we ought to pass this bill in some shape to give him additional compensation.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend understand that it is considered a hardship in the Army to be detailed for many, many years in Washington?

Mr. HULL. If I only had a salary of thirty-seven or thirty-eight dollars a month I should consider it a great hardship to be detailed here in Washington.

Mr. CANNON. After all, when the gentleman speaks of thirty-seven or thirty-eight dollars a month he has declined to give me the information as to what the allowances are.

Mr. HULL. His allowance is one ration in kind, and fuel and the rent of one room. The commutation of rations, as I have stated, is 30 cents a day,

Mr. CANNON. What is the fuel?

Mr. HULL. Whatever it costs to buy fuel.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not commuted?

Mr. HULL. That I could not state.

Mr. CANNON. And the rent is how much?

Mr. HULL. Twelve dollars a month for one room.

Mr. CANNON. So that the $37.88 per month wants to be increased about $26 a month? I did not suppose it amounted to so much.

Mr. HULL. It is about $30 a month extra.

Mr. CANNON. So that this $37.88 really means $67.88. And for the greater part of the time he was paid at the rate of $95 per month, until his pay was reduced a short time ago.

Now, what I want to ask the gentleman is this: He has already stated his position as to the policy of increasing the retired list of the Army. I want to suggest to the gentleman that if length of service should place a noncommissioned officer upon the retired list as a commissioned officer, it ought to be done by general law.

Mr. HULL. That is a question before the committee, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. Well, will the gentleman give us, then, the benefit of an amendment to this bill, making it include all hospital stewards of like service, on the one hand, or will he ascertain the facts as to the man's age and ascertain his expectancy by the Carlisle tables and give him a lump sum rather than make this provision?

Mr. HULL. I will answer the gentleman by stating that I will not make such an amendment to the bill, because I am rather of the opinion that I would oppose a measure of that kind if it were before the House. I wanted simply to rise here for the purpose of letting the House know what the bill was without intending to take a part in the debate for or against it. It is a subject that the committee has reported on, and only one case was before us. The man has had exceptional service; but to my mind it is a very serious question whether any man enlisted for a certain purpose, and who has received the pay that he was entitled to under that enlistment, should expect Congress to give additional pay, no matter what his services may have been.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman investigated far enough to say that there is no hospital steward in the service who has had as meritorious service as this one?

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes; I have investigated far enough to know that I believe this man stands alone for length of service and distinguished service; but I do not know that that will be true. I think it is true to-day.

Mr. CANNON. That is, he has had longer service than the others.

Mr. HULL. He has had longer service, a great deal longer, than any of the others. I think the Medical Department would have been glad to see one hospital steward provided for at a higher rate of compensation without making him an officer of the Army.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, if my friend will yield to me one moment; and then I think I will have stated what I desired to state, and I would rather not take time myself to do it.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman. I suppose I have plenty of time.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, this class of applicants, I will say to my friend, in the military service and in the civil service that abound in Washington has easy access to Congress. That bare fact enables somebody to put them in when the waters are troubled. Now, then, in giving relief to this class of cases, when you fail to provide for them except in only worthy cases, I submit to the gentleman that wisdom dictates that in giving the relief we should not demoralize the service; and I submit to him that it is a demoralization of the service when, outside of general law, you place a man upon the retired list as a commissioned officer, the others, whether they are equally worthy or not, will feel that they are being discriminated against. Now, I far prefer making a general rule for all worthy hospital stewards to giving this relief, and if we give it, I would rather put it on the higher ground of thirty years' efficient service and give him a lump sum rather than to appoint him on the retired list by special or general act as a commissioned officer, when the man never did and never will perform a single day's service in his life as a commissioned officer.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois stated that he wanted to ask me a question; but in place of that he has gone ahead, in his lucid way, to express his own ideas in regard to this matter.

Mr. CANNON. I want to know whether it meets my friend's approval.

Mr. HULL. You did not even ask that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. That was implied. There was an interrogation point at the end.

Mr. HULL. I will say that this question of hospital stewards has been considered by some of us quite fully and an investigation had to the extent of asking the Surgeon-General as to the necessity of giving hospital stewards rank and as to the difficulty of keeping that branch of the service up to the required efficiency. The Surgeon-General replied that they had no trouble in getting the best of service; that they had more applications than they had positions to fill, and that it was not necessary to give any additional rank or additional pay for this branch of the service. The only question before the House, as I said in the beginning, is whether, in the case of a man serving thirty-five years, you shall single him out and by act of Congress give him something that he did not originally look for, that he had no reason to look for, and for which he had no equitable claim.

Mr. CANNON. Is the gentleman willing to give the committee his opinion upon this question?

Mr. HULL. No; I am not. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FENTON].

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, I have but one word to say in regard to this bill. Now, the position of the gentleman from Illinois was that if we pass this bill, which is to retire a noncommissioned officer instead of a commissioned officer, it will demoralize the service. Why not say when you have retired a second lieutenant as a first lieutenant that that will also be a demoralization, because it furnishes a precedent for a large class?

Now, that this is a meritorious bill is well attested by the evidence referred to in the report, and it is not necessary for me to touch upon that subject. It is a meritorious bill, and in passing it you will give a slight recognition to a very large class of men all over this country who served in the ranks of the Union Army, and, I might also say, of the army on the other side. They are entitled to recognition for special merit just as much as though they had worn stars. It is the prerogative of this House to judge as to merit, and it has done so in the past. Why not do so now and recognize an enlisted man who has served thirty-five years and who has been recommended by the highest medical authority of this city and of the Army as an expert in his way. The case has been proven clearly before the committee, and I am sorry that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is not able to decide to-day exactly which side he is on in this matter. [Laughter.]

Pass this bill and you will recognize not only a worthy man, but many thousands or even millions of worthy men who did not all have the honor to wear shoulder straps during the recent unpleasantness. There are thousands, yea, millions of men in this country who left the college, the school, the workshop, the counting room, the farm, to enter the service of their country. They could not all be officers. There was not room for them all to be officers. But they did their duty in their several spheres. Many of them were wounded and stricken down upon the field before they had time or opportunity for promotion. I ask that this bill be passed. I did not intend to say a word upon it, but I have felt it my duty to a class of soldiers of whom I am an humble representative—the men who served in the ranks. I ask for those men recognition at the hands of this House. It is just that they should have it, and I trust that this bill will receive the support of both sides of the House. I have nothing more to say. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, of course I am aware that we in the minority are powerless, and that all the bills brought up this afternoon will be railroaded through regardless of what the special merit or demerit of any particular measure may be. Listening to the gentleman from Ohio, the exclamation occurred to me, "Oh, patriotism, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" This unworthy appeal on every occasion to the issues of the late civil war in order to pass some unmeritorious bill is something with which I have no sympathy.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No, sir; I am trying to talk now. In making that remark, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the measure that is now pending before the committee, I conceive that I do not transcend the limits of proper parliamentary discussion, for I can safely say that few bills of so little merit are ever brought before this body for consideration. This bill has so little to be said for it that even the chairman of the committee which reports it feels bound to rise and apologize and state that he does not believe in the policy of this bill or in the policy of any bill such as this. What does this bill propose to do? Let me call the attention of the committee to the fact that the appointing power is vested by the Constitution in the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and while it is true that Congress may vest in the President alone, or in any one of the Departments, the appointing power, still in reference to the appointment of officers in the Army or Navy it has always been held that the President should appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. And yet, sir, in this bill the President alone is given the appointing power and the Senate is deprived of the conjoint executive power contained in its right to confirm appointments made by the Chief Magistrate. That of itself is a somewhat suspicious provision of the bill. I for one do not believe that it is constitutional in any bill to direct that the President shall appoint a particular individual.

Mr. FENTON. Does this bill direct the President?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, it has always been held, and it has been the uniform construction by the Executive Departments of this Government, that acts such as this are not merely directory, but that when they are passed by the Congress of the United States they become mandatory upon the Executive; and the gentleman from Ohio knows very well that after this bill has once become a law it will be said that the President must appoint, because the Congress of the United States have declared that such is their wish as expressed in their legislation. By this bill you direct the President that he shall appoint Frank M. Marshall—what? Not a second lieutenant of pharmacy, for which, he having been a hospital steward for many years, you might have some show of logic or reason, but a second lieutenant of cavalry. In the name of common sense, why should a hospital steward be appointed a second lieutenant of cavalry? Is not the proposition ridiculous on its face? Are we willing to go on record as saying that we are in favor of appointing hospital stewards, after a certain number years of service, second lieutenants of cavalry? Why not appoint them captains of artillery? Why not appoint them colonels of infantry? Why not appoint them captains in the Navy? There would be just as much sense in appointing them to these offices as in appointing them second lieutenants of cavalry on the ground that they have served a certain number of years. What relation is there between the functions of a hospital steward and the duties of a second lieutenant of cavalry? Now, what is the object of this bill, Mr. Chairman? It is to give an individual a gratuity, a pension, and I submit to the gentlemen in the omnipotent majority here that it is a wrong thing to do, that it is improper legislation, and that legislation of this kind will come home to plague them in the future.

This man may be a very good man, but because he receives now $37.88 a month, is that any reason, I would ask, why we should increase it to $125 a month? Why, Mr. Chairman, there are thousands and tens of thousands of meritorious citizens in the United States of America to-day who do not receive even $37.88 a month, and have not received it during all of these thirty-five years that this man has been receiving his pay. Why not pension all of them? Why not give away more of the money of the people of the United States wrung from them by taxation? Are we to be guided by such logic as that simply because a member rises in his place on this floor and says this man has been meritorious and has rendered able and efficient services? Why, plenty of people do that. Is that a proper cause of legislation on our part to increase the salaries of men who do perform their duties? Shall we, under such circumstances, pass a bill in defiance of the words of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs? Shall we pass this bill because we are told that it would do no harm; because the man would like to have the money; because a distinguished surgeon says he has done a service that was efficient? Is that any reason why we should give him $125 a month?

Mr. FENTON. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. No, sir; not at this time.

I continue, Mr. Chairman, that because a distinguished gentleman says he ought to have $125 a month, because he is a good mechanist and has done good service, has taken good care of the instruments, that he has been a hospital steward, and has been in the service for thirty-five years—I repeat, is that any reason why we should make him a second lieutentant in the cavalry to wear the yellow stripes and yellow shoulder straps and strut up and down with a sword? Why not put him on the active list if he is so important to the service? It is a mere farce to put these people on the retired list and give that as an excuse for increasing their compensation. Such claims as this come up every day in the year.

Do you want to extend the system of gratuities further than we have already extended it? Do you want further to extend the system of making presents of the money of the people? Are you ready to vote away their money in this manner without giving a chance, hardly, to hear the report read; without placing a copy of the bill in the hands of the minority or calling attention to the fact that you do intend to bring such bills before the House for consideration—a bill involving legislation that is condemned by your own leaders—and pass it against our remonstrances?

I tell you, gentlemen, you can not sustain that character of legislation. You may object as much as you please to the remarks that I am making, but the people of this country, when their attention is called to this matter, will speak to you in tones that you can not misunderstand, and tell you that they are not yet prepared for this character of legislation. Stand up like men now, and even if this be fathered by one of your omnipotent majority, for once vote it down and declare against this character of vicious and class legislation.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if one kind word on behalf of any man who ever served in the United States volunteer forces is a crime committed under the guise of patriotism, the gentleman from New York will never be convicted. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman——

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, sir; I will not yield to you. I treat you as you have treated other people. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] My colleague, an inexperienced man, in charge of this bill [Mr. FENTON], attempted to explain to the gentleman from New York its features and he brushed him out of his sight repeatedly. Therefore he can reply to me in his own time.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is no crime to pass this bill. My attention was not attracted to it until the gentleman from New York assailed it. [Laughter.] It always makes a prima facie case stronger when he attacks a bill or opposes it. [Laughter.]

This bill does not direct the President of the United States to put this man on the retired list. On the contrary, the legislative intent is manifested in the amendment reported by the committee. We amend the bill by refusing to direct, and simply confer on the President of the United States the authority.

I do not believe that the President of the United States, either the present one or any other who may come in the future, will do injustice to the country by putting a man on the retired list under a mere authority conferred by law unless he finds him, upon investigation, worthy, and that the case is a proper one to be so acted upon.

Now, in this case the contention is simply this and no more. Here is a man who for more than thirty-five years, more than a generation of the lifetime of the people of the world, has done duty, not the duty of the ordinary enlisted man, but has performed efficient duty for the Government. He has done duty of a high grade, and the commissioned officers in the line to which he belonged so testify. He is now old, broken down, and poor, no longer able to earn even the pittance he has been paid heretofore. And the whole question now that has brought out such attacks is the question whether the Government of the United States, having received these great services from this man through all of these years, now in his old age and poverty, is willing to give him this little pittance. That is all there is of it.

Such a case, probably, would never occur again in the legislation of the country. There are only a hundred of these men anywhere on earth, young and old; and probably not one will ever again attain to any such age as this man has reached. He has been spared to serve through the great struggle of his country, beginning in 1861 and coming down to the present day.

Now, is it worth while that we should reject this claim? Is it not, after all, for a man of the talent—the admitted talent—of the gentleman from New York, a rather unfortunate thing that he should deem it his duty to assail this poor, helpless man in this sort of way? I presume he would vote to give a pension to the widow of a major-general. I presume some of the votes that will be cast against this poor little bill would not be cast to repeal some of the $2,000 pensions that are now being paid to some of the widows of officers of the United States. I do not believe the gentleman from New York would. Why not do the fair thing then—even say it is a generous thing—why not do a generous thing?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and I never will knock the gentleman out again while I live. I feel sorry for having done it. I was only pointing out to him how he treated my colleague.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire only a minute or two. I am much indebted to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] for the compliment which he has paid me in admitting that I have some talent——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Misdirected talent. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. But I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that I do not assail this individual, Frank M. Marshall. I never heard of him, thanks to the policy of the majority, until a few moments ago. I did not even know that there was such a bill before this House. I did not know that there was a measure for the relief of Frank M. Marshall on the Private Calendar. We try to keep pretty well posted; but with all the matters of legislation here it is impossible for anyone to be familiar with every bill upon the Private Calendar. Now, my remarks were made with no reference to the individual. I have not a word to say against him; but what I have denounced and what I do object to is the pernicious character of legislation such as this. I believe that it is wrong in the mode and manner of its consideration. If you want to give a gratuity to Frank M. Marshall, then vote it to him. Give him $125 a month. If in the judgment of the majority here, with all their talk about a depleted Treasury, with all their talk about appropriations, they desire to give Frank M. Marshall $125 a month in proper form, I am not certain that I should not vote for such a bill; but I do object to bills of this character, bills which place——

Mr. PICKLER. I rise to a question of order. I thought I would not do it, but the gentleman has occupied so much time that I will. Paragraph 6 of Rule XIV provides that no member shall speak more than once on the same question without leave of the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] is wrong. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] is asking me a question. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. He is speaking in the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from Ohio had no time to yield.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not yielded the floor. I only sat down to rest, knowing the habit of the gentleman from New York, and that I should have time to rest while he was framing his question. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. That is simply an evasion of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule the point. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] will proceed.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I had intended to conclude my remarks and should have finished in a moment or two had it not been for the point of order made by the gentleman from South Dakota. Now, I admit—I will concede for this side of the House—that we have no rights, that we ought to be absolutely silent when any bill comes up reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. PICKLER. You never support any bills for soldiers.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It may be that the gentleman from South Dakota thinks that I ought to make the same concession in reference to bills coming from the Committee on Military Affairs; and it would have been indeed the height of temerity on my part to have ventured to object to any point of order made by the gentleman from South Dakota if it had been an invalid pension bill; but I hope, in view of the fact that it came from another committee, that he will overlook my offense, that he will pardon me for having interfered for a few moments with his desire to railroad these bills through, and force them through the House.

Mr. PICKLER. That is the most sensible of anything you have said to-day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT]. [Laughter.]

I think no one on this side desires that that side shall always keep still. I do think that some of us would be greatly obliged to the gentleman from New York if he would sometimes keep still. [Laughter.] That is as far as I would go along that line.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly. I have not answered the question of the gentleman from New York yet, but it is all right.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I got the impression from the gentleman's remarks that this bill gives general authority to the President, when he may see fit, to retire hospital stewards as second lieutenants. Is that correct?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, not at all. It simply gives him the power in this one particular case.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. It stops there?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; and this is an extraordinary case. Everybody must admit that. There is only this one case, and I do not care whether you put it in the form of a gratuity or what you do. It is a great Government which has taken thirty-five years of this man's life in a grade of service outside of the ordinary service of an enlisted man. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] certainly knows that a hospital steward is not an ordinary enlisted man. He has to be an educated man. In these days of peace he has to be a man of extraordinary education, and by the statement of Dr. O'Reilly, whose word nobody will dispute and whose judgment as a medical man nobody will successfully criticise, it appears that he is a man of unusual education. Now, here is a special case of this character. That is all there is to be said about it. I never heard of Frank Marshall before, either. I stand equal with the gentleman from New York. And I imagine Frank Marshall never heard of the gentleman from Ohio—that is, myself. I suppose he has heard of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT]. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. General debate has not been closed, and I make the point of order that it is not in order to offer an amendment at this time.

Mr. CANNON. Then I would be glad to be recognized for a single sentence or two. I am on all fours with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. I never heard of Mr. Marshall until the last half hour. I have nothing but the most kindly feeling toward him, having heard. He seems to have done long and honorable service for the Government. No doubt he deserves well of his country. Having said that much, I can not be successfully accused, and I think nobody will try to accuse me, of antagonism to this bill from any standpoint except——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order that it is impossible for us to hear the gentleman on account of the noise.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Except from the standpoint of a proper policy. Our Government does not, except touching certain specified officers who represent the armed force of the Government—the Army and the Navy—give pensions or gratuities after the service ceases.

Mr. SPALDING. And the judiciary.

Mr. CANNON. And the judiciary, as the gentleman says. It is our boast that we have no civil pension list. Now, then, other governments pursue, so far as this retired pay is concerned, perhaps—I was going to say, a more liberal policy than we do; but that would not be true. They have a civil pension list, and we have it not, substantially. But we have so far as retired pay of army and navy officers or of enlisted men is concerned. The Government of the United States pays more than any other government on earth. I do not think it pays too much. When a commissioned officer goes upon the retired list he goes on at three-fourths pay. If an enlisted man goes upon the retired list with a length of service like unto that this man has had, or a much less length of service, he gets three-fourths pay; and if this hospital steward goes out of service, why he goes out with payment, as I have computed, of $57 a month as long as he lives. Now, then, so with every other hospital steward of considerable service. I know it is a hard thing to stand up and oppose the granting of considerable pay to anybody who has performed honorable service. It is so much easier to be courteous and do justice, as it is claimed, than to deny it. We are sometimes swept off our feet. That is all I want to say about that matter.

Now, if he goes on the retired list as second lieutenant of cavalry his pay is $122 a month. That is all. If he goes out of the Government service as a hospital steward his pay as long as he lives is $57 a month.

Mr. HULL. It is three-fourths of $122 a month he would get.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; he would get three-fourths of $122. He would now get $57 a month. Now, what kind of a position does that place us in? A man serves the Government actively for thirty-three years and when he retires you give him twice as much as he was getting while in the service! Well, that is a funny kind of precedent, is it not? It is unique. Now, then, when general debate shall have been exhausted I mean to offer this amendment to this bill in the best of faith, because if it is to be enacted we should make it general. Amend by adding at the end of the bill:

And it is further enacted, That hereafter any hospital steward who has served as such in the Army for thirty-three years may be appointed on the retired list as second lieutenant of cavalry.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will make the point of order on that, that it is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. How is that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. MAHON. The gentleman can not offer as an amendment a provision which would be general on a private bill.

Mr. CANNON. I think so; and I think, considering the number of hospital stewards who have had thirty-three years of honorable service in the Army, I am quite sure that my kind and just friend from Ohio will not make any technical point of order against this act of justice to that class. I know his heart would not permit him to do it; and I only want to do complete justice.

Now, whether that is politic or impolitic, it is right, and it is wrong to make this precedent from a standpoint of public policy. This man goes out of employ in that class and gets $57 after he goes out of the service of the Government until he dies, and the only question is whether he shall get double that amount, substantially, by this legislation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, after what the gentleman from Illinois has so well said as to why this bill should not pass, it is hardly necessary to say anything. I am opposed to it not only for the reason which the gentleman from Illinois has so well stated, but I am opposed to it on principle. Now, I understand that the chairman of the committee himself, in his opening remarks upon this bill, apologized to the committee for its appearance here. There never was anything like it, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, in all legislation in this House. An effort is made to place a hospital steward upon the retired list as a lieutenant of cavalry.

Now, I can not understand why he should have picked out this position or why he should have selected the position of lieutenant of cavalry. He could have been made a lieutenant of infantry or a lieutenant of artillery. I suppose that for some special reason they selected the position of lieutenant of cavalry and assigned him to a position on the retired list as lieutenant of cavalry. I suppose the object is that he may join that famous band which, it is said, was commanded by Captain Jinks, if I remember the name correctly, who commanded the "Horse Marines." He wants to be in a position to feed his horse in a manner similar to that which the followers of Captain Jinks used. I can not see, Mr. Chairman, why this man should be put into the cavalry service on the retired list.

Mr. CONNOLLY. A cavalry lieutenant gets more pay than a lieutenant of infantry.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; but if you wish to increase his pay you might make him a lieutenant in the artillery service on the retired list, and then I think he would receive still more. Whether that is so or not, I understand that as a lieutenant of cavalry he receives more than he would receive as a lieutenant of infantry, and I suppose that is the reason for putting him in the cavalry. I am opposed to increasing the retired list, unless it may be in a few exceptional cases. But, apart from that, why should you take a man who, so far as I see, never did a day's service in the Army?

Mr. HULICK. You are mistaken.

Mr. PARKER. He served two years.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Ah, as hospital steward; but, from my own observation during more than four years' service in the war, the duties of the hospital stewards were not very dangerous. They did not carry guns; they did not perform any duty where there was danger at the front. This man has had a pleasant position ever since the war, but even if he had not, no reason has been assigned why we should take men who have served as hospital stewards, even after thirty-three years of service, as suggested in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and place them on the retired list as cavalry officers. The Surgeon-General of the Army, Dr. Sternberg, is brought here to testify in behalf of this man, and he says this is a very dangerous precedent. He says:

I should be glad to see him retired with the rank of a second lieutenant of cavalry, as provided by this bill. The only objection I see to the passage of this act is the fact that it will furnish a precedent for similar applications from other worthy men who have had long service as hospital stewards.

But again, why fix the period of service at thirty-three years? Why not retire these men after thirty years of service as hospital steward? Why not do it after twenty-five years of service?—for that is a long time. What is proposed here is to take a man whom you have worked during the prime of his life, when, doubtless, he rendered efficient service, when, by reason of his years, his experience, and possibly his special fitness, he was enabled to do good work, and then, after thirty-three years of service, to retire him, not by the usual method or on the usual basis of retirement, but with almost double the pay that he received in the days of his efficiency. Ordinarily the object of putting a man on the retired list is that an old war horse may not be displaced entirely or left without means of support. The country, in recognition of his past service, permits him to be put on the retired list, which keeps him still in an honorable position, but always carries a reduction of his pay. His rank is not reduced, but his compensation is. Here the proposition is to pursue the opposite course, to retire this man as an officer of cavalry and to nearly double his pay. A further object of the retired list is to give honorable recognition for past services rendered in the conflicts of war; but how long will that list be regarded as an honorable one if hospital stewards are to be placed upon it and their pay increased far beyond that they earned when in the prime of their life and efficiency?

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the kind of a bill that we have here presented to this committee. I sought to have bills considered here to-day that had merit in them——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I feel very sure that the gentleman would not state as a fact that which is not a fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I certainly would not, and if I have made any such misstatement I shall be glad to have it corrected.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The records of the War Department show that this soldier was enrolled on the 18th of May, 1861, was mustered in on the 23d of May, 1861, in Company C, Fourteenth New York State Militia, which subsequently was the Eighty-fourth New York Infantry, and was discharged on March 13, 1863, two years and a half later, for the purpose of enabling him to enlist as a hospital steward. Now, if my memory serves me, that regiment, and that soldier as a member of it, had a splendid opportunity to see some of the bloodiest events of the war during the period of his service while he was a fighting, marching soldier in the line.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am much obliged to the gentleman for calling my attention to the record. Perhaps I was inaccurate when I suggested that this man had not seen service at the front. If that regiment did go to the front and serve there, as the gentleman from Ohio seems to say it did, then I was inaccurate and I withdraw that part of my statement. But at the end of two years and a half this man sought a better position. I do not object to that. We all do that. It is a very desirable thing to get out of the ranks, to get rid of carrying a gun and facing the muskets of the enemy, and to march into the position of hospital steward. But let me ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he does not think that this man would have been doing much better and higher service for his country if he had continued as a soldier carrying his gun at the front?

Mr. GROSVENOR rose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield to the gentleman later. Let me ask him a further question. Suppose this man had done that and had gone through the entire war rendering his services as a private soldier, which I think would have been much more meritorious than the service of a hospital steward—at least, it would have been more dangerous—in that case would the gentleman from Ohio be in favor of setting the precedent of making that man a lieutenant of cavalry on the retired list and increasing his pay? I hardly think my friend from Ohio would be in favor of such a proposition.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like, as a member of the committee reporting this bill, to have a few minutes before the Committee of the Whole rises.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I think that if the gentleman from Tennessee will refresh his memory by looking back over a third of a century he will remember that it was very difficult sometimes to get hospital stewards, and that men were selected and often compelled to take that class of service because they were competent to do it, and in that way were cut off from the opportunity of promotion, and yet were doing work not only as valuable, but in a great many instances as dangerous as any other service in the Army. Take as an illustration of the dangers attending this hospital service the battle of Chickamauga, for instance. Would the gentleman like to have been there on the 20th day of September, 1863, when the service was fired upon and many of the men wounded, killed, or taken prisoners?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I do not want any more of it. I am well satisfied with my experience and do not want to go through the same thing again.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will close in a minute or two and the gentleman can take the floor in his own right.

In further answer to the gentleman from Ohio. He says, as I understand it, that the Government was glad to get hospital stewards at that time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how that may be; but I can understand how there might have been very little difficulty in securing such service. Indeed, I can not see where the difficulty comes in. They did, no doubt, many of them, render excellent service; and this man, the beneficiary of this bill, the gentleman tells us, and as the report shows, was employed in this work for more than thirty years. Now, if he deserves more pay as a hospital steward for the efficient services he rendered, then bring in a bill and give it to him. If by reason of his long services he has earned more than the pay of a hospital steward, let him have it. Dr. O'Reilly, an eminent man, a surgeon in the United States Army, makes a recommendation in this case that is worthy of consideration. As I understand it, he opposes the placing of this man on the retired list at any rate of compensation. His letter suggests a different remedy to be applied in this case. Here is the letter; it is appended as a part of the report:

I therefore submit to you the propriety of recommending the insertion in the forthcoming Army appropriation bill of a section fixing $125 a month as the pay of one hospital steward, to be designated by the Surgeon-General, and to make the clause operative from the date of the passage of the bill.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, it will be, it seems to me, a little better to adopt this course to do this if you want to give the man an increase of salary—better as a precedent, better if you want to preserve intact the honor of the retired list than that you should fill it up with men who have never seen any cavalry service or any service, as you propose to do here. I think that statement that he never saw cavalry service is true. Of course I do not know the facts; but yet you propose to place this man on the retired list as a commissioned officer.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I hope we will now have a vote on this bill.

Mr. PARKER. I will not detain the committee five minutes. I was on the subcommittee that considered the bill and recommended its consideration here, and I do not propose to sit silent and allow the statements which have been made to go uncorrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota has been recognized. Does he yield the floor?

Mr. PICKLER. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. PARKER. Only five minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. That will take us beyond the time when the committee must rise. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. McRAE. The general debate is not closed. The gentleman can take the floor in his own right.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I am on the committee which presented this bill, and was also on the subcommittee that reported it. I have heard the bill called ridiculous. Even my friend the chairman of the committee on which I serve (who has not seen this man) declares that in his judgment it is the establishment of a bad precedent. If the facts can be placed before us I think we may not concur with this view, but will recognize that it may be a special case, an exception, both as to the man and the circumstances. The man is a brother of Marshall, the artist, a man fitted to associate with officers and gentlemen anywhere, by his manners and evident intelligence and reading, as well as by his long and efficient services to his country and scientific knowledge and skill. I repeat, it is a special case and not a precedent. Why? Because there is no chance for promotion in this corps. If this man had remained in the line as a private in the Army he would, without doubt, have been commissioned as an officer long ago.

Mr. MILES. Why did not he?

Mr. PARKER. Because he did his duty to his country in the hour of his country's need, in the staff, in the field, wherein he was most useful, in the way that he was best educated to perform that duty.

Mr. Chairman, if he had remained in the line he would long ago have won a commission through good service and in the course of the ordinary examinations. We promote officers from the ranks by general law, making them first corporals, then sergeants, and then lieutenants. There is no man who served in the war, certainly who served with the skill of this man, who would not long ago have won his promotion and commission as an officer if he had continued in the line. But his service was needed in other fields. It was a service of equal importance with any other rendered by our soldiers. He had knowledge and experience in the duties of the position which he assumed, and which he has filled so long and so ably. Any man with the intelligence and ability of this man who served in and since the war could have won a commission for himself. Unfortunately this branch of the service to which he was confined afforded no opportunities for promotion. No man can become a doctor unless he has gone through the various courses and the medical college training required to attain that position. It requires many years of outside study, training, and practice to obtain a commission as a surgeon. The avenues of promotion are closed in this Hospital Corps, in which it seems that this man stands alone, and in which he has served thirty-five years.

There are in that corps only 100 in all, and the question is raised here whether, under all of the circumstances, this man should be made an officer. The corps is so small that a general law seems inapplicable.

Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee considered this matter with care. I deprecate special laws as much as anyone. But we considered that in this case it was our duty to ask the House to determine whether or not it should extend to a member of this branch of the service, in a special case of so much merit, for skill and devotion, the promotion that he so justly deserves, and whether we should make him an officer. There is no general law to apply to the case. This committee may take into consideration that he would probably have been an officer if he had remained in the line, and this House only can do justice, if this measure be just.

Now, that is all I have to say. I have said it hurriedly in the few moments allotted to me. I trust that I have fairly stated the reasons that influenced the committee; and whether the bill be in the best form or not, whether it should be general or special, whether the House on the whole approve it or not, I do not think that there is justice in abusing the Committee on Military Affairs for bringing in a bad bill, or one that does not deserve the full and fair and careful consideration of the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I desire to offer——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I submit that general debate has not been closed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the committee rise and report the several bills as amended with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That motion is not necessary. It has already been ordered on two bills.

The motion of Mr. HEPBURN was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that the committee had had under consideration sundry bills; that they had directed him to report the bill H. R. 951 without amendments and with a favorable recommendation; the bill H. R. 3139 with amendments and with a favorable recommendation, and that they had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4510 and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3139)——

Mr. HEPBURN. I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CANNON. I guess we had better have a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 123, noes 25.

Mr. CANNON. I demand tellers, Mr. Speaker.

Tellers were refused, 15 members, not a sufficient number, rising in support of the demand.

Mr. CANNON. By the bye, Mr. Speaker, on mature thought about the matter, it seems to me that it would be quite proper for me to demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, not a sufficient number rising in support of the demand.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEPBURN. I raise the point of order that debate is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman can raise the point of order, and still I suppose——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. CANNON. I think there was not a quorum in the House when we agreed to adjourn over.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to make that point.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is 5 o'clock. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the House will now take a recess until 8 o'clock. At half past 10, by vote of the House, it will adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] will please perform the duties of the Chair this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) resumed its session, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the rule under which the House is in session this evening.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

SETH PORTER CHURCH.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar of Unfinished Business the bill (H. R. 3292) granting an honorable discharge to Seth Porter Church, alias Samuel Church. It has passed the Committee of the Whole without objection. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan for the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant an honorable discharge to Seth Porter Church, alias Samuel Church, from Battery I, Second United States Artillery, to date August 29, 1848.

The following amendment, reported from the Committee of the Whole, was agreed to:

Insert at the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That the passage of this act shall not entitle such soldier to any pay or allowances prior to the date of such discharge."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PICKLER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar under the special order.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. On what part of the Calendar will the committee begin as soon as the House goes into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. PICKLER. Calendar No. 127, the bill (S. 249) for the relief of Charles E. Jones.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Senate bill 249 is the first bill to be considered.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. PICKLER; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division, not for the purpose of making the point of no quorum, but just to see how many of us are here to-night.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 58, noes none.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

CHARLES E. JONES.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles E. Jones, late photographer for the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, said pension to be at the rate of $30 per month.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill was discussed and the report read the other evening, and I think we ought to be able to dispose of it without reading the report. I think it is well understood by the committee.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it will hurt to have the report read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the report may be read.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have it read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 909) granting a pension of $50 per month to Charles E. Jones, late photographer of the Eleventh Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, for consideration in connection with Senate bill 249, which passed the Senate January 21, 1896, granting a pension of $30 per month to the said Charles E. Jones, having carefully examined and considered the facts and circumstances in evidence in this case, respectfully attach hereto the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions and adopt it as their report in this case, and adopt Senate bill 249 as a substitute for House bill 909, and earnestly recommend that the same do pass.

[Senate Report No. 21. Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 249) granting a pension to C. E. Jones, have examined the same, and report:

This bill passed the Senate during the Fifty-third Congress.

Claimant was not an enlisted man, and hence not pensionable under the general law. He was employed as a photographer, and in that capacity rendered valuable service to the Union cause. Not only did he faithfully perform his duties as a photographer, but the evidence clearly shows that he performed actual military service, and that while thus engaged he received a gunshot wound which has resulted in almost total blindness.

There seems to be no question as to the incurrence of the disability, the affidavit of Capt. R. B. Ward, herewith appended, being conclusive on that point. Many other affidavits are on file which tend to confirm Captain Ward's statement. Had claimant been an enlisted man there can be no reasonable doubt of his right to pension, and having performed actual military service, and being wounded while thus engaged, the duty of Congress to come to his relief is clear and imperative.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

AFFIDAVIT OF CAPT. R. B. WARD.

STATE OF MISSOURI, County of Jackson, ss:

In the matter of Charles E. Jones, claimant.

On this 5th day of September, A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for said county, duly authorized to administer oaths, Robert B. Ward, age 61 years, a resident of Kansas City, in the county of Jackson and State of Missouri, whose post-office address is Kansas City, Mo., well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declared in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

"I have known above claimant, Charles E. Jones, since the spring of 1862, when he came to and joined the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry as photog rapher, I being captain of Company D of said regiment. Said claimant was not an enlisted man, but I know of him being in several engagements under military orders, and in April, 1863, I know of my personal knowledge that the said Charles E. Jones was ordered to take photographic view of Longstreet's fortifications at the siege of Suffolk, in the State of Virginia, and while performing his duty, acting under orders of Gen. John Peck, commanding officer, said claimant, Charles E. Jones, received gunshot wound from Longstreet's sharpshooters in the small of back, across the spine, which affected his eyesight and has caused blindness of both eyes to such an extent that said claimant has to be accompanied with a guide at all times to walk around, rendering him as good as totally blind.

"R. B. WARD."

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 5th day of September, 1890.

AFFIDAVIT OF W. D. HOOVER, M. D.

STATE OF KANSAS, County of Miami, ss:

In the matter of appeal for pension through special act of Congress by Charles E. Jones, regimental photographer, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers.

On this 29th day of October, A. D. 1894, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the said country, duly authorized to administer oaths, W. D. Hoover, aged 60 years, a resident of Paola City, in the county of Miami and State of Kansas, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly affirmed, declares in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

"That I have been acquainted with the said Charles E. Jones since 1867, when he first came to Paola, Kans., and that his eyes were diseased then, and that they continued to grow worse until he became totally blind, or nearly so. He can just barely grope his way with the use of his cane. He received a gunshot wound across the small of his back while in the line of duty in the Army during the late war. The ball passed across the back just over the second lumbar vertebra, and has left a scar over one-half an inch across and more than an inch in length. It is a wonder it did not cause paraplegia. His eyes became affected before he recovered from the wound in the back, and I am of the opinion, taking the prostrated condition of his system, especially the nervous system, into consideration, if the wound in the back was not a primary cause of the disease of the eye it certainly was a secondary cause. Said Jones has been a good citizen during his residence here.

"The above is from my personal observation of the case, and is written by myself."

His post-office address is Paola, Kans., and further declares that he has no interest in said case, and is not concerned in its prosecution.

W. D. HOOVER, M. D.

STATE OF KANSAS, County of Miami, ss:

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant, including the words erased and the words added, and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in the prosecution; and that said affiant is personally known to me, and that he is a credible person.

[L. S.] WARD J. CARPENTER, Notary Public.

(My term expires March 27, 1895.)

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman. I thought I was recognized——

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. If the gentleman will allow me just a moment, I desire——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. ERDMAN. Not just yet. There is plenty of time yet.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. You can make your speech on the next bill. I simply desire to ask——

Mr. ERDMAN. I have not yielded the floor to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I simply desire to make a request that this go over.

Mr. ERDMAN. I thought I recognized this as an old friend of the Fifty-third Congress. I happen to have been a member of the same committee in that Congress. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Martin, was its chairman. This bill was considered by the same committee; and I now send up to the desk, for the Clerk to read, the report of that committee of the Fifty-third Congress, so that the House may have the two reports and be able to contrast the views of that Congress with those of this Congress on this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The report (by Mr. Martin of Indiana) is as follows:

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (S. 2351) to pension Charles E. Jones, and submit the following report:

"This bill passed the Senate January 24, 1895, and fixes the rate of pension at $30 per month.

"The petitioner, Charles E. Jones, was not a soldier. He was a civilian, who accompanied the Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry as a photographer. It is shown by the evidence that on one occasion, while taking a photograph of Longstreet's fortifications, under orders of Gen. John Peck, he received a gunshot wound across the small of the back from one of Longstreet's sharpshooters.

"The petitioner has since become almost totally blind, and it is claimed that this is a result of the wound referred to, but it is not shown to the satisfaction of the committee that the present condition is chargeable to said wound.

"The policy of the committee has been well defined in cases of this kind, namely, to report bills to pension civil employees and nonenlisted men only for wounds or injuries received in battle.

"It does not appear that this man was wounded in battle, but the testimony does show that he was acting under orders and received the wound at the hands of the enemy. Your committee therefore favor pensioning him for this gunshot wound and its direct results only, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass after being amended as follows:

"Strike out the words 'of $30 per month,' in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the words 'proportionate to the degree of disability from gunshot wound of the back and results.'"

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, the policy of this Congress and of this committee is to pension anyone who can get a member to present a bill and demand it, provided it is backed by a few petitions, by a Senatorial request or some other request made upon him. The policy of the Fifty-third Congress, as announced in that report by Mr. Martin, had an entirely different end in view, as shown by what is contained in that report. I now make the same motion that was made by Mr. Martin in the Fifty-third Congress, namely, strike out the words "of thirty dollars per month" and insert the following in line 8: "Proportionate to the degree of disability from gunshot wound of the back and results."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ERDMAN. This amendment I will send up in a minute. This will put him on an equality with other soldiers, with soldiers who have fought, not as an amateur photographer, probably a camp follower, who had a slight wound in the back and who is now sought to be pensioned for blindness, which never in the world resulted from that wound. The policy of the Fifty-third Congress was to establish equality as near as possible. The policy of this Congress seems to be to establish favoritism. I therefore send up the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8, strike out the words "of thirty dollars per month" and insert the following: "Proportionate to the degree of disability from gunshot wound of the back and results."

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this amendment should be adopted will he then cease filibustering and vote for the bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. I will say to the gentleman that I have never yet filibustered. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have not finished on that subject. I have announced heretofore, as I announce here tonight, that I am in favor of scrutinizing and examining and passing bills with merit; but I am not in favor of demoralizing the whole country with the spectacle that we have been making here with favoritism.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. If this amendment should be adopted, what rate of pension do you understand this soldier would receive?

Mr. ERDMAN. Just the same rate as any other soldier with the same character of wound would receive.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Do you understand, if this bill should pass with the amendment you propose, that the soldier would receive anything?

Mr. ERDMAN. If any other soldier in his place would receive anything he would. The fact that he was a photographer, a civilian employee, should not raise him above the honest soldier who served and fought for his country.

Mr. PEARSON. Why, he took the breastworks with his camera!

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am speaking of this case. Do you not understand that if this bill should pass with the amendment you propose this man would not receive any pension at all?

Mr. ERDMAN. I think he would if he has a ratable disability, and if he does not have a ratable disability from that wound he is not entitled to it, no more than any other civilian employee is entitled to it.

Now, I am in favor of examining and acting in a judicial way upon such bills and of passing those that have merit, but I am in favor also of exhibiting sufficient manhood to say to our constituents and to the country when bills are bad that they are bad, without being troubled by the opinions of the few people who may take offense.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, I trust that this amendment will be voted down. It would simply send this soldier into the Pension Bureau for such magnanimous and generous treatment as he might expect there under existing circumstances, with no general law behind him. This bill passed both branches of Congress once and failed of signature only because the President had not time to sign it. It has passed the Senate and now awaits only the action of the House, and I trust the amendment will be voted down. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I have sat here every Friday night since the beginning of this Congress and never raised one word of objection to the many, to me, objectionable bills that have been presented here and have passed this committee. Now, I think it is time—for I owe it to myself, and I owe it to the thousands of soldiers all over this country who are without pensions and suffering from the need of them—I think it is time to call a halt and see what we are doing, when, with the hundreds of soldiers' bills that are pending before this Congress, we are relegating them to the rear and bringing the photographers forward first and undertaking to provide pensions for them. I say, sir, that this is an insult to the thousands of soldiers in this country who are still unprovided with pensions and are to-day suffering for the necessaries of life because of disabilities incurred by them in their service to the country.

The beneficiary of this bill has been spoken of here as a civilian employee. He was no such thing. There were no such civilian employees as photographers; at least there were none in the army in which I served in the West. If Pennsylvania and the troops of the East were furnished with photographers to their regiments, it is something that we in the West never knew of. I often heard of the soft bread and the paper collars of the Army of the Potomac, but I never heard of their having photographers until this bill was presented to this House. [Laughter.] Let me add that when some of the Army of the Potomac, a corps or two, came West and joined hands with the men of the West, and when we saw them charge up the face of Lookout Mountain under old Joe Hooker, we never after that laughed at the paper collars and the soft bread of the Army of the Potomac. [Applause.] We struck hands with them as worthy comrades; but they brought no photographers with them. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I say that this bill is not a fair appeal to those of us who were in the Army. It comes here under the guise of pensioning a civilian employee in the Army, and I can not understand what it is that influences the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House to hold back and keep in the rear the bills for the pensioning of actual, sure-enough soldiers—men who carried sword and musket.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I demand that the gentleman's words be taken down.

Mr. CONNOLLY. All right. Take them down.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I protest.

Mr. CONNOLLY. This may be treason to the administration of the Invalid Pensions Committee, but if it is it is time that somebody on our side became a traitor. [Applause.]

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw the demand, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand is withdrawn, and the gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I say I can not understand what it is that actuates this Committee on Invalid Pensions to neglect the bills that are pending before them for sure-enough soldiers, men who carried sword and musket and stood in the forefront for years, but who can not bring themselves now within the strict letter of the law so as to obtain pensions under the general law.

Their bills are before the committee. They have been sleeping here the whole winter through, and in advance of them these other bills are pushed to the front, apparently with the desire on the part of each member to do something if he can for himself in his own district. That, I submit, is not the spirit that should control us here. We should grant these pensions under special laws, if we grant them at all, in cases where men are manifestly entitled to pensions but can not squarely bring themselves within the general law so as to enable the Pension Office to decide in their favor. As to that class of bills, bills giving pensions to soldiers and to their widows, the sentiment that has inspired the enactment of special laws of that kind has been approved for twenty-five years by the people of this country. We are justified in passing them; but are we justified in letting such claims sleep and bringing to the front bills for teamsters, photographers, camp followers of every grade and kind, and giving them pensions while the soldiers who are really entitled to pensions are one by one dropping into their graves, dying in poorhouses or living upon the crumbs of charity?

I maintain that it is time for some of us to speak out and call a halt in this thing. We have sleeping on the files of this House, and have had for months, a bill to amend the general pension law in such a way as to provide that thousands of these cases that now have to be passed upon by the House may be adjudicated in the Pension Office—the general bill prepared by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, providing modes of proof that will be more just than the rules laid down by the Pension Office. But, sir, we are so busy making Presidents—this Congress is filled up with so many candidates for the Presidency and so many Senatorial candidates—that we have no time to take up or allow to be taken up and enacted into a law this general bill for the benefit of those who are entitled to pensions.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman kindly put those remarks into a formal statement and submit them to the Committee on Rules, so that this Invalid Pensions Committee may secure consideration of that general bill for which we have petitioned earnestly?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I would be very glad to see any member of that Committee on Rules ever attend these Friday night sessions. [Applause.] We are left here; and of all the gentlemen who have been selected as the engineers of this House—the gentlemen into whose hands the machinery of this House and its leading committees has been put—not one of them ever deigns to show his face here at a Friday night session for the benefit of the old soldier. [Applause.]

When the various candidates for the Presidency are seeking the support of the old soldier they can coddle him and embrace him, but here in this House, when the old soldier and his widow come, feeble and tottering with wounds or age, there is no time to give them a hearing. And it is hard work in this House, with its two hundred or more Republican members, to get Republicans and Democrats enough together at a Friday night session to make 100.

Mr. PICKLER. The trouble is that there is so much speaking it takes up our time.

Mr. CONNOLLY. My dear sir, this is the first time I have troubled you or your committee with any remarks of mine. I have sat here and kept my mouth shut, and permitted you to run as you chose without a protest from this side of the House, and whenever a protest came from the other side I found somebody ready to fling the taunt that it came from a Confederate.

Mr. PICKLER. That is right.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Here is one, sir, that was not a Confederate—one who respects his comrades, one who loves the old soldier and believes that he is entitled to better treatment than he is receiving at the hands of this House in this Congress. We are running wildly——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I think we are not running at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, that is true, sir. But, in so far as we can, we are shoving to the front the camp followers and providing pensions for them; but how are the really meritorious cases treated? Look at your files and look at the files of the committee and observe the hundreds of bills that are not touched, that sleep the sleep that knows no waking. Look at that bill providing for a general amendment of the pension laws that will open the doors of the Pension Office to the adjudication of thousands of cases against which the doors are now closed.

Why does that bill sleep? Why is no earnest step taken to have it passed? I will not say that it is because the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions does not desire it; for I know from what I see of him that in his heart he does desire it. But there is a power somewhere in this House that is blocking this thing—holding it back; and I insist that with the numbers we have we break the chains that are binding us on this side of the House and bring up that general bill [applause] that shall open the door of the Pension Office, as the generous people of this great country intend that it shall be opened, to a fair adjudication of all the claims of the old soldiers and their widows that are still unadjudicated, and not force them to come here as beggars bowing down before their respective members of Congress, pledging their votes and support if a special bill can be got through Congress for their relief. Great God! has it come to this—that the men who bore the heat and burden of the day for three or four long years—the men to whom everything was pledged in the days of our nation's trial—shall now come crawling on their knees, suppliants to members of Congress, begging that a bill may be introduced to give them the pittance that the great hearts of the people of this country intend and always intended they shall have?

I insist that in disposing of this Private Calendar we should lay aside all bills proposing to pension camp followers and take up the bills that pension the men who carried the musket, the men who carried the sword, and the bills to pension their widows, who are suffering to-day for want of the necessaries of life. When all those bills have been acted on and no more of that class remain, then take up, if you choose, the cases of the sutlers ,the photographers, and all the other camp followers, and if you can get anything for them get it. But do not bring them here under the guise of soldiers and force the soldiers to stand back until the camp followers have been provided for.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, in this individual case, if this bill is to pass, instead of sitting here and saying that we will vote this man a pension of $30 a month, let us say that we are willing to put him on the roll precisely the same as a private soldier—an enlisted man—would be if he had been shot in the back. If he had been enlisted and forced to take the chances that the other soldiers had to take, and to apply for his pension under the general law, proving the degree of his disability resulting from that shot wound in the back, on the evidence that he presented the pension would be given to him under the general law—just such pension as he would be entitled to. Now, I say there would be some fairness in that.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly.

Mr. MILES. I believe the gentleman is trying to approach this question with a judicial spirit and fairness——

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is entirely immaterial. If the gentleman desires to ask a question——

Mr. MILES (continuing). And I have very much respect for the gentleman as a lawyer.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Never mind the respect. What is the question?

Mr. MILES. Very well. I wanted respectfully to ask if you do not believe that the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania, Judge ERDMAN, which has been offered to this bill, will have the effect you refer to of putting this soldier upon an equality with those who were enlisted?

Mr. CONNOLLY. My dear sir, I was just about speaking of that when you asked the question. I was about to say that if this man had been a private soldier instead of a mere camp follower, that if he had been an enlisted man and forced to stay there as this man was not forced to stay there; if he had been a man who was obliged to stay in the ranks and take his chances there, and had been compelled to remain with his command in the service, and had received the same kind of a wound—a shot in the back—as this man is claimed to have received, when he got home he would have got a pension under the general law if he had applied for a pension. He would make his proof as to where, how, and when he received the wound; the Pension Office would examine him, evidence would be submitted in support of his claim, and after all the evidence had been carefully considered by the Pension Office, if he had been found entitled to a pension at all he would have received just that pension which the general law allows for such cases. We allow him a pension of so many dollars a month. We allow all men who served in the Army as enlisted men and who were wounded in the same way the same amount of a pension that would be received by him.

But in this case you undertake to increase it by a special act. Now, he would get a certain pension if he were an enlisted man, a man who was forced to take his chances in the Army, who could not leave and go away whenever he wanted to, who could not escape the duty imposed upon him, but must remain and face all of the consequences that confronted him as a soldier. But here is a proposition that a camp follower, a man who could leave when he wanted to, a man who was not an enlisted man, who was not strictly a soldier in any sense of the word, who gets shot in the back, may come to Congress (he does not go to the Pension Office, for he can not, he is not entitled to any pension there), but he comes to Congress and says, "I want a pension; I was wounded in the back; I am nearly blind now from the effects of it. I do not want to take my chances in the Pension Office like a common, enlisted soldier, for I was not that, but I want you gentlemen in Congress, I want my member in Congress, to whom I will give my support and the support of all my friends if he succeeds in getting me a pension, I want him to get Congress to say absolutely that I shall have $30 a month no matter what disability occurred to me by reason of the gunshot wound."

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion just there?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. We put that amendment into the act that passed the Senate, to which reference has been made heretofore.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I understand that.

Now, see the attitude here of gentlemen with reference to this bill. They do not want the camp follower to go down into the crowd of common soldiers and take his chances for a pension the same as if he had been an enlisted man. He did not take his chances with them in the field, and that is exactly what Mr. Jones did not want to do during the war. He did not want to take his chances with the enlisted men, because there was danger there. He does not want to take his chances with them now. He comes to us and asks us to make a special exception.

Let him, Mr. Chairman, if this thing is to be done, if you think he is a "sure enough" soldier and entitled to a pension just the same as the men who went to the front and took all the risks and hardships of the soldier's life, be served as you would serve the enlisted man, namely, put him on the pension roll as an enlisted man and at the same rate. Give him the right to obtain just such a pension as the private soldier would receive and as the general laws entitle him to receive. Is not that fair? Could these gentlemen from Kansas ask any more than that? Lord! what makes this man better than any private soldier or enlisted man in the Eleventh Pennsylvania? That is all these men could get. Why not adopt the amendment and let him have exactly the measure that he would have received had he been an enlisted man? [Applause.]

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in reference to the last remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. Evidently the gentleman from Illinois is not advised as to facts in this case. He shows that by his remarks.

Now, he asks, what are we putting a camp follower on the pension roll for? I deny it. The Committee on Invalid Pensions, from the showing that we have here before the committee, find that this man is totally and wholly incapacitated from performing any manual labor.

Now, any private soldier who was so incapacitated would be entitled to receive $30 a month. This man was wounded in the service, and we have placed him at $30 a month. Now, what does all this talk of the gentleman from Illinois amount to? We have given the very thing he says he wants, and the very thing he says ought to be done. He says, "Place this man on the same plane with the private soldier"; and there is where we have placed him exactly.

Now, the gentleman talks about camp followers, and says he has not taken up the time of the committee before, that he has sat here night after night and listened. Mr. Chairman, if one-half the members on this side of the House should make half-hour speeches condemning the pension legislation of this House, condemning the administration of this House, condemning the leaders of the House, condemning the Committee on Rules and everybody else—I say if one-half the members on this side wanted to consume half an hour each we should never touch a pension case. I confess it with regret—and I never criticise a gentleman's motives—we might just as well look this thing squarely in the face. I regret to say that the pension legislation during this session has been held back, it seems to me, by too much debate. That is the truth about it. It is because of speeches like that with which the gentleman from Illinois has arraigned the committee, which have been made criticising the Pension Committee—it is from that cause that the delay has come.

Now, the gentleman is very conscientious about this bill. Why, the last Democratic House and the last Democratic Committee on Invalid Pensions reported this same bill; and yet the gentleman from Illinois is so extraordinarily conscientious and has much to say for the old soldier and the widow; and probably, as we have found out in the committee, as the evidence comes to us, probably while the gentleman has been talking, two or three of them have died and lost their pensions by the gentleman's consuming time here in this committee.

Mr. LACEY (to Mr. PICKLER). You and I examined this case very carefully in the last Congress.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. And you and I arrived at the conclusion——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Iowa is too well schooled in what is proper on this floor to carry on a colloquy in the first and second person between himself and other gentlemen. Let us have this out now in a parliamentary way.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to know whether these Friday night meetings are held for the purpose of invalid pension business or for the purpose of turning this House into a schoolhouse debating society? [Applause.]

Mr. LACEY. After having carefully examined all the testimony in that case, did you not believe that justice would be arrived at——

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. KEM. I rise to a question of order. We can not hear a word that the gentleman is saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. LACEY. I will address myself to the Chair, and I know if the Chair can hear me the gentleman from Nebraska can. I ask whether or not, after carefully examining the testimony, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] does not believe entire justice will be done this soldier by simply authorizing this man to be pensioned for this wound, and not take up the time in discussing the question as to whether the rate ought to be increased, or in attempting to fix the rate in the House? The House seems to be united substantially upon this question, that we can not rate him for his injury.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, this committee is just as competent to fix the rate that man gets by law when he is totally incapacitated at $30 a month as to send it over to the Pension Office, to be delayed there for probably another six months, and possibly never allowed. Now, one word in regard to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] says—why can not the Committee on Invalid Pensions go to some of these old soldiers' and widows' bills, and not waste our time in arraigning camp followers. I characterize that as a baseless slander upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I do not know whether the gentleman from Illinois knowingly makes it; but it is just as false as if he did know it.

Of the pension bills we have passed this Congress so far there has only been one other case like this. That was the case of a teamster who was wounded, and who is dragging himself around the streets on one leg and a crutch. That is the only other case. These are the only two men whose cases have been reported and passed upon in this House from the committee of this character. Why should the gentleman get up here and heap charges up of that kind, and try to bring the Committee on Invalid Pensions into disrepute? He asserts that which is not the fact in any regard; it is not fair to us; and it comes with ill grace from the gentleman. Does he take the position that a man who presents a bill granting a pension has not a right to be heard on the case? Does he take the position when the bill was presented by the member—I do not remember who introduced it—that that man had not the right to have his bill considered, have it reported to this House, and have it passed upon by it?

The committee passed upon it and bring it in here. It is our duty to bring it here. If you do not think it right, vote against it. You talk about soldiers in your district and the great injustice being done. I never have yet heard, and I come pretty near knowing as many soldiers as most men around here, but I have never yet heard of any soldier complaining of the pitiable pension paid to any man who was shot in the service of the United States. [Applause.] The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] is the first man, I believe, that was ever heard to complain. He misstates the facts in this case. Further, this man, as the report shows, was taking these photographs by order of General Peck, commanding. He was ordered to go and take them. I do not know what for, but he was under military orders, and he had to take them.

Mr. PEARSON. Did he take any prisoners along with the breastworks?

Mr. PICKLER. Now, the gentleman can answer that himself. He was wounded while under orders of the general commanding, and that is sufficient for the Committee on Invalid Pensions; he should not be derided by gentlemen if they vote against him. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Chairman, criticises this committee for bringing in such a bill as this, when it has always been the custom, in every Congress, if a civilian was wounded in the service that he should receive a pension if it resulted in a disability. Why does he arraign us? Why does he find it necessary to attack the position of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, when we are doing no more than has been done by Democratic Committees on Invalid Pensions for all the years past. It is unfair; it is not right. You are putting a false construction before the country. You are trying to slander the committee of which I have the honor to be the chairman, and I again say it is not fair and not right.

In conclusion, as I said at the start, I regret that pensions are delayed at this session. The gentleman criticises the Committee on Invalid Pensions for following the precedents that have been followed for years. We have been criticised for that, and they have not produced a single instance where we have not followed the precedents of Congress after Congress in what we have done. I say that I regret the course the other side have taken in delaying us this session in this House and criticising the Pension Committee. They are delaying pension legislation; but to have Republicans get up here and attack the Committee on Invalid Pensions and delay the consideration of bills by making speeches is not right nor in the interest of the soldiers and their widows whom the Committee on Invalid Pensions are laboriously and faithfully seeking to pension.

Now, in conclusion, I desire to say that I allow to every gentleman the right to talk when he thinks he ought to. But, Mr. Chairman, this side of the House will be held responsible for the pension legislation of this session, and if we are to take up our time, as has been done on this side, criticising the committee and criticising its cases at the evening sessions when there is no ground for criticism, this House will be held responsible for not passing pension legislation. And it ought to be so held.

The fault is not with the Committee on Invalid Pensions that bills are not passed more rapidly, but with this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, as I had occasion last Friday night to say something upon this bill, I desire to say, as I was endeavoring to say when we adjourned on that evening, that I shall vote against this bill because it is a bill that has no merit in it. It is undeserving, and one of the points that I was going to make against it was the insufficiency of the evidence.

There is not a scintilla of evidence to show that this photographer was ever ordered to photograph Longstreet's works. There is not an order which can be found showing that any general ever ordered him to go upon the field to do any service. There is not a single bit of evidence to show that he was ever an enlisted man. There is not a bit of evidence to show that that little scratch in the back that he received while he was running away is the cause of the blindness he is suffering from. There is not a single bit of evidence so show anything about it, even to show that there is such a man.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if we are not to pass this bill I at least hope that the man himself will not suffer by being slandered on the floor of this House. The finding of fact is that he was not running when he was shot. He was not shot in that way. The statement is that the ball passed across his back while he was engaged in doing his work. Now, why assert that the man was running when he was shot? Is there any evidence of it?

Mr. TALBERT. Not at all; but I would like to ask the gentleman how you can shoot a man in the back before his face. [Laughter.] He certainly must have been getting away. I admit that it is only a presumption, but it is based on circumstantial evidence.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Did the gentleman from South Carolina ever retreat during the war?

Mr. TALBERT. I sometimes got to the rear [laughter], and I expect the gentleman has done it, too. I did not call it retreating, though. I just got tired fighting and wanted to go back to rest a while, and when I got rested I always came on again. [Laughter.] However, I do not care to enter into any levity with regard to this matter.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no levity about it. The gentleman says he sometimes went to the rear. A man has a right at times to leave a battlefield, and he generally has his back to the field when he is going away from it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. Just as this man was doing, I suppose. But, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to admit that this photographer had a brave heart, only, like a good many other soldiers, he had a pair of cowardly legs that took him out of the way, and so he was shot in the back. [Laughter.] Furthermore, there is no evidence to show that his blindness was the result of that wound.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. TALBERT. I always yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry was at Suffolk during the time that General Longstreet was gathering provisions in the Blackwater section in the spring of 1863. I was there at the time and I know something about the situation. I knew General Peck—a man in ill health, who was unable to ride a horse; so that when he went out he went in a carriage. I knew the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry, and I knew something of what has been termed here the works of General Longstreet. Longstreet's force was generally moving, gathering provisions and carrying them away. There was no engagement there except skirmishes between Longstreet's force and detachments that were sent out to defeat his purpose. I have not the slightest doubt, from the testimony in this case, that this man was there with the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry as stated, and that he did go out at the request of General Peck to take a picture of what may be termed General Longstreet's works, although they must have been very meager works, because his troops were moving most of the time, and while this man was taking pictures he undoubtedly got wounded.

Mr. TALBERT. While he was taking a picture?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT. Then he could not have been taking Longstreet's picture. There is a conflict of testimony right there. He must have been looking the other way. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of New York. If my friend from South Carolina will permit me——

Mr. TALBERT. I believe I have the floor, but now the gentleman from New York seems to have taken it away from me. The gentleman asked me to yield for a question.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No; for a statement.

Mr. TALBERT. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Well, will the gentleman permit me to conclude my statement?

Mr. TALBERT. Go ahead, though I think you are injuring your cause. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS of New York. In doing that work a man might well have got in a position in which he could be shot across the back. I was about to say, however, Mr. Chairman, that I think this House will acquit itself to the satisfaction of everybody, except perhaps those who have special views as to the rate, by accepting the suggestion to put this man on the pensionable list and let the rate be determined at the Pension Office. If he was wounded as stated he will receive a pension such as would be given to a soldier who incurred a like disability in the service. I think that is quite enough. He will get $30 a month if totally disabled: if he requires an assistant a portion of the time he will get $50 a month, and if he can show total disability, requiring constant assistance, he will get $72 a month. I believe if he is given a pensionable status at the Pension Office the case can be adjudicated there in less time than it will take to get this through the Senate.

Mr. PICKLER. It has gone through the Senate. This is a Senate bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, we passed a bill exactly like this for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] in the Fifty-third Congress, but the Commissioner of Pensions refused to issue a certificate and the gentleman from Iowa has had to come into this Congress and introduce another bill.

Mr. LACEY. It was not a case exactly like this. That is the point.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I think the plan I have suggested would be exceedingly fair to this man. It would place him upon the same status before the Pension Office as any soldier of the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I think that if that disposition is made of the bill——

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. AVERY. I rise in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] has the floor.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that if the gentleman from New York will offer such an amendment as he suggests, providing that this man be put on the pension roll, the rating being left to the Pension Bureau, or if there is such an amendment pending, that will dispose of this case and we can go on with other business.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not very often trouble this committee, and I want to say just one word on this bill. The disability alleged in this bill is blindness. The wound received by this photographer was a wound in the back, and there is no evidence before this committee, at least none that I have seen, to show that that wound in the back has produced any other disability than this disease of the eyes. He is able to walk about the streets——

Mr. PICKLER. With some one to lead him.

Mr. AVERY. But there is no paralysis; there is no disease of any of his limbs; yet his blindness is attributed to the wound that he received in the back. I say, sir, that no surgeon of the Pension Office, no intelligent surgeon anywhere in this country or any other, will certify that this man's disease of the eyes is the result of that wound in the back. That is the fatal defect in this bill, which, in my judgment, should not have come before this committee. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question having been put on the amendment of Mr. ERDMAN,

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. PICKLER. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 60, noes 49.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JONATHAN SCOTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4526) granting a pension to Jonathan Scott.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $72 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jonathan Scott, of Oswego, Kans., late of Company M, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4526) granting a pension to Jonathan Scott, submit the following report:

The beneficiary, Jonathan Scott, was a member of Company M, Sixth Regiment Iowa Cavalry, and served for three years, receiving an honorable discharge from the service. He was subsequently pensioned for disease to his eyes contracted in the service, and his pension increased from time to time as the disease progressed, until he lost the sight of his eyes entirely, when the pension was increased to $72 per month. He was drawing this rate of pension up until about November or December, 1895, when he was entirely dropped from the roll, for the alleged reason that his eyes were diseased at the time he entered the service. The testimony filed in the Pension Office is very voluminous, but there can be no question but the great preponderance of the testimony shows that the soldier's eyes when he entered the service were sound and free from disease, and that the injury thereto was occasioned while in the service and in the line of duty.

This case was placed in the hands of a special examiner, who secured the testimony of two or three witnesses at the former residence of the soldier in Missouri, hostile to him, who testified that the soldier's eyes were weak when he entered the service. But in opposition to this is the sworn testimony of many neighbors, who have known the soldier prior to his enlistment for months and who were intimately acquainted with him from his childhood, who state emphatically and positively that his sight was not defective in the least, and that if he had been afflicted with weak eyes they would have known it. Notwithstanding this great preponderance of the evidence in the soldier's favor he was dropped from the roll and is now receiving no pension whatever.

Your committee believe that no unbiased man, on examining this mass of testimony, could reach any conclusion except that this claimant has been unjustly deprived of his pension. The committee therefore report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I should be glad if the gentleman who has this bill in charge would lay before us the same evidence which he must have laid before the gentleman who made this report, but which, according to my recollection, was not laid before the committee. We ought to have some such statement in order that we may be able to judge of the remarkable condition of facts alleged here. If we act merely upon this report, we are asked to determine, without a scrap of evidence, without the citation of what any witness has sworn to, that the Pension Bureau did wrong in dropping a man who was receiving $72 a month. If the gentleman who has the measure in charge, either the gentleman who introduced the bill or the one who prepared this report, will give us some of the evidence upon which the report is based, we shall be able to act upon it more intelligently.

Mr. NORTHWAY. This report shows, does it not, that a former Pension Bureau awarded to this man a pension of $72 a month?

Mr. ERDMAN. The pension awarded him was gradually increased up to $72 a month, the full limit.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Precisely so. Now, is not that pretty strong evidence that the man was entitled to something?

Mr. ERDMAN. But is it not a fact that it was found by this Bureau that the man had this disease before he went into the service?

Mr. NORTHWAY. That was found by some bureau.

Mr. ERDMAN. By the same Bureau that had granted him the $72 a month.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Not the same Commissioner?

Mr. ERDMAN. Well, the same Bureau.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is another thing.

Mr. ERDMAN. No, sir; it is the same thing.

Mr. NORTHWAY. It was not the same Commissioner.

Mr. ERDMAN. Not the same Commissioner, but the same thing. I refuse to recognize politics in this matter.

Mr. NORTHWAY. It is not the same thing when it is the action of a different Commissioner.

Mr. ERDMAN. Certainly it is.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Oh, no; when one judge of the court of common pleas overrules another judge without any evidence, it is not the same court by any means.

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes; it is the same court.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I shall take pleasure in giving the gentleman some information on this subject. If he had desired when this case was presented to the Committee on Invalid Pensions to examine the testimony before the committee from the Pension Office, embraced in 50 or perhaps 100 affidavits, he would have had no difficulty in ascertaining the facts connected with this case. I suppose that the Committee on Invalid Pensions, when it has examined the evidence in a case and reached its conclusions, is not required to bring before the House all the evidence upon which it bases its findings. If that were required, you might as well abolish the committee at once and save time. Now, the facts in this case are stated in the report of the committee and abundantly established by the testimony on file in the Pension Office; and the gentleman can have access to it at any time.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania said a few minutes ago that he wanted an opportunity to vote for the case of a real soldier. I have here the case of a man who enlisted almost before the sound of the first gun had died away, and who continued in the service until 1865—who served all through the war—who never shirked his duty. He received three honorable discharges, which I have now on my desk. He is to-day groping his way around, absolutely blind. That country which he offered his life to save is to him black as Egyptian night. He was placed upon the pension rolls at $72 a month. His loss of sight was progressive, and as it advanced from stage to stage his pension increased until it reached $72 a month. When the present Commissioner of Pensions assumed control, and when numbers of pensions were overhauled, it was discovered that poor Jonathan Scott was receiving $72 a month. One of these special inspectors was placed upon his trail. This inspector went down to Missouri, the former residence of Jonathan Scott, where he had enlisted, and he found there three individuals who were willing to testify—not in their own language, as required by the rules of the Pension Office—that this man's eyes were weak when he entered the service of his country. Upon these three affidavits that special examiner reported against him and they dropped this claimant from the rolls, notwithstanding the fact that there were at least 40 affidavits of credible witnesses swearing to the contrary.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to ask my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN] a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas still has the floor.

Mr. BRUMM. I beg pardon. I thought the gentleman had yielded.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I hold in my hand a statement, Mr. Chairman, signed by men who have seen service, 200 of them, who were well acquainted with Jonathan Scott, and who know the existing conditions, who come before this House and beg the House most respectfully to restore the pension that was taken from him without authority of law.

I am here, sir, to say that I have examined carefully the evidence in the Pension Office in the hands of the Commissioner of Pensions, and I say now, without fear of successful contradiction, that there is not a man on this floor who will examine the testimony in that case and who will not admit that a great wrong and an injustice has been done to this man. No man can reach a different conclusion, 40 inspectors to the contrary notwithstanding.

Go to the office, read the testimony, examine all the papers in connection with this case, and I venture to assert that there is no one here who will not agree with me that a man who gave four years and a half of the best period of his life to the defense of his country, who has been wrongfully deprived of his pension after it had been granted, and who is groping his way in darkness—for to him there are no flowers and no bright light of the day—I say that there is no man who will not agree that his pension should be restored, and that a wrong, a grievous wrong, has been done him. If you only had the time to read the testimony in this case there is not a man here who would not vote to restore the pension to this soldier, who is now 72 years of age, blind, and helpless.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the pension be restored. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will allow me, ought not we to say that when the Government mustered that man into the service they accepted him on the ground that his sight was good, and should we now plead as a defense against the just claim that is set up for him that his eyesight was not good? [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. That is the point I wanted to make to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is precisely what we say and what the patriotic people of this country say, and what the Committee on Invalid Pensions have said. That is what they propose to say by a general bill if they can ever get the action upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Ohio in his inquiry well-nigh covered the point that I desired to raise with my colleague. I wish to ask whether the prima facies are not in favor of this soldier from the fact that he was accepted and mustered into the service? Besides, if his eyes were good enough to enable him to perform five years of hard service for the people of the United States in the cause of the Union, is it not right that he should receive the pension that the law allows him, and should the Commissioner of Pensions have been permitted to deprive him of it? I say no. Besides, it is a violation of the rule established that when a soldier had enlisted we have no right to go back of that fact in order to ascertain whether he was fit to be enlisted at the time, unless, of course, there was fraud in the case. The presumption is all in favor of the soldier.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to a brief and fervent flow of eloquence, but have not been enlightened with reference to this case, nor do I think that anybody else has been.

You are going to put a man on the rolls at $72 a month without any evidence before you whatever. You are going to say that when a man is blind, whether he had the seed of the disease in him when he entered the service or not, he shall be the recipient of charity at your hands, provided he can find a member on this floor who will rise and offer a bill in his behalf and have it referred to the Pensions Committee.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. Is not the gentleman from Pennsylvania a member of the committee?

Mr. ERDMAN. I am.

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. As a member of the committee, did you take the precaution to look at the evidence before this bill was called to the attention of the House?

Mr. ERDMAN. Does the gentleman want me to disclose all that occurred in the committee?

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee. No, sir, not that; but you can answer that question without disclosing what occurred in the committee.

Mr. PEARSON. I hope the gentleman will answer the question.

Mr. ERDMAN. If I do I will have a long story to tell.

Mr. BARHAM. Well, do not answer it, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. ERDMAN. Whether it is right, fair, and just to the people of this country to do what you are about to do here is the only question that concerns us now.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. ERDMAN. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. It appears that this man was discharged three times from the service, so he must have been enlisted three times. Now, the Government having enlisted him three times, and having accepted his service for four and a half years without complaint, do you not think it a piece of cowardice and a very mean act to undertake at this late hour to set up the claim that his eye sight was defective when he was enlisted? Do you not think it cowardly and disgraceful to go back of this fact, which the evidence discloses in the case, and undertake to set up a different state of things from what must have existed at that time in view of the fact that he was enlisted?

Mr. ERDMAN. If the proof is clear, as in my judgment it must have been, that his eyes were diseased before he went into the service, unless we change the law for the benefit of every soldier you wrong all the rest, you wrong yourself, and you wrong the country by this action.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, we will try it anyhow. We will stand the wrong. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the motion that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation, it was agreed to.

SOPHIA J. HAMILTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Sophia J. Hamilton, widow of Charles S. Hamilton, major-general of volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sophia J. Hamilton, widow of the late Charles S. Hamilton, major-general of volunteers, and pay her a pension of $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Sophia J. Hamilton, widow of Charles S. Hamilton, major-general of volunteers, after carefully considering the same, respectfully report:

Maj. Gen. Charles S. Hamilton served with great distinction in the war with Mexico and in the war of the rebellion. His military services, compiled from the records of the Adjutant-General's Office, are as follows:

He graduated at the United States Military Academy in 1843. He joined the Fifth Infantry in July, 1846, and served with it in Mexico in the war with that country, and was severely wounded in the battle of Moline del Rey September 8, 1847. Sick in the City of Mexico from wounds to November, 1847; on duty with his regiment in Mexico to the close of the war.

Besides the battle of Moline del Rey, he participated in the battle of Monterey, siege of Vera Cruz, capture of San Antonio, and battle of Churubusco.

Capt. William Chapman, Fifth Infantry, commanding regiment, says:

"Lieut. C. S. Hamilton, commanding Company I, was severely wounded early in the action while urging his company on, but he raised himself up with assistance and continued cheering and encouraging his men until they were beyond the reach of his voice."

His civil-war record is as follows: He entered the volunteer service as colonel Third Wisconsin Infantry May 11, 1861, and commanded the regiment in Maryland to August 31, 1861. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers to rank from May 17, 1861, and major-general September 19, 1862.

He commanded a brigade in General Banks's division, Army of the Potomac, to March 15, 1862; the Third Division, Third Corps, to May 2, 1862, and the left wing, Army of the Mississippi, from June 15 to August, 1862; on leave to September 15, 1862; commanded the Third Division, Army of the Mississippi, to October 26, 1862; the district of Corinth to January 10, 1863; the Sixteenth Army Corps to February 5, 1863; and district of Corinth and Jackson, Miss., to April 13, 1863, upon which date he resigned. He subsequently served as captain and provost-marshal, fourth district of Wisconsin, March 11 to October 15, 1865, when honorably discharged.

General Grant, in his report of the battle of Iuka, October 22, 1862, says:

"It was a part of General Hamilton's command that did the fighting, directed entirely by that bold and deserving officer. I commend him to the President for acknowledgment of his services."

General Rosecrans, in General Order No. 152, dated October 25, 1862, to the Army of the Third Division of the district of the West Tennessee, in regard to the battle of Corinth, says:

"It would be to me a great pleasure for me to signalize in this general order those whose gallant deeds are recorded in the various reports, but their number forbids. I will only say that to General Hamilton * * * and the brigadier and regimental commanders under them I offer my thanks to the gallant and able manner in which they have performed their several duties."

General Hamilton left the service of his country in broken health; his disabilities were progressive until he became practically helpless. Owing to the condition of his health, he lost much of his property, and at the time of his death left his widow in dependent circumstances. The Fiftieth Congress, by special act, pensioned the General at $50 per month in recognition of his eminent services.

His widow is now 71 years old and is greatly in need of the relief provided in the bill. The bill is reported favorably with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman who has this bill in charge to explain to the House why this woman should have $50 a month. I should like to ask first how much this woman would be entitled to under the law, if entitled to anything? How much could she receive under the law, if she could receive anything? If there is any gentleman here who can answer that question, I should like to have it answered.

Mr. LACEY. She would be entitled to $30 a month.

Mr. KEM. The gentleman says she would receive $30 a month. Now, I want some one to explain upon what basis it is proposed to give her this extra $20 a month?

Mr. Chairman, on last Friday night there was a bill passed here, recommended by the committee, granting to the widow of a captain who gave his country no actual service other than three months, perhaps, a pension of $20 a month. Following that was a bill granting a pension to the widow of a private soldier in the ranks who gave his country three years of hard service and was very severely wounded in that service. This committee gave her but $12 per month. Now you come here to-night and are not satisfied with this unjust discrimination—unjust because it is unjustified—and you pension a photographer who saw no service at all, who was simply taking pictures under contract for private gain and private benefit. You follow that now with a bill granting to the widow of an officer $20 per month more than she is entitled to under the law and $38 per month more than the widow of a private soldier could get. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this sort of legislation does not meet with the approval of the common soldier of this country, and as evidence of that fact I want to send to the Clerk's desk and have read some resolutions passed by a Grand Army of the Republic post on the Pacific Coast covering this very point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the pension claims of tens of thousands of the soldiers and sailors of the late civil war remain undecided while thousands of the claimants are yearly going to their graves—

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I should like to inquire if this was read the other night?

Mr. CROWTHER. That is the same one.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Is this read a second time?

Mr. KEM. Not by me.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I think this was read the other night. If so, it ought to be put down as a part of the variation——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to have it read in his time.

Mr. KEM. I desire to have that read as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And whereas we believe that the granting of special pensions at high rates to the widows of deceased officers of the Army and Navy is an unwarranted and unnecessary continuation of the discrimination of rank in favor of a class who were neither soldiers nor sailors, but only claim through inheritance: Therefore

Be it resolved by Sedgwick Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of California, That we oppose and condemn the granting of special pensions at high rates to the widows of deceased officers of the Army and Navy as an unjust distinction against ex-soldiers and sailors and their widows, who are limited to pensions of eight or twelve dollars per month, if any, and we demand that the widows of officers shall be pensioned under existing general laws.

Resolved, That the adjutant of this post forthwith forward a copy of these resolutions to each member of Congress from the State of California and to the adjutant-general of the Department of California, Grand Army of the Republic.

Adopted at a regular meeting of the post held February 11, 1896.

E. D. COOKE, Adjutant.

Mr. KEM. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to show that this sentiment is not confined to the Pacific Coast or to the Western part of the country, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read some other resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS NATHANIEL LYON POST, NO. 2,
DEPARTMENT OF CONNECTICUT,
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Hartford, Conn., February 4.

Whereas the members of this post in regular session assembled, having heard read the arguments and testimony from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the date of January 14, 1896, pertaining to the bill for pensioning the widow of the late General Cogswell, of Massachusetts, and after a thorough discussion and careful consideration of the subject, desire to place on record the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Nathaniel Lyon Post, No. 2, Department of Connecticut, Grand Army of the Republic, regret to find a distinguished soldier and member of this post, in his place in the United States Senate, advocating sentiments and performing acts calculated to discriminate against the widow of the common soldier in favor of the widow of the commissioned officer in the matter of governmental recognition of the claim upon its bounty of one and the other.

Resolved, That we are unable to discern from the arguments adduced on what grounds of logic or of equity the case of men holding different grades of rank and receiving unequal compensation for time and services rendered in the cause of their country can at any time apply to relatives or friends of the same, never having rendered or being called to the performance of such service.

Resolved, That we most respectfully, yet earnestly, protest against the spirit of discrimination involved in the action of vouchsafing to the widow of the common soldier holding recognition from the Government of the faithful performance of patriotic duty equal to any comrade of any rank—an honorable discharge—the petty sum of $8, $10, and $12 per month, while the widow of another, who did no more than his duty (sometimes not even that), is accorded five, six, eight, and ten times as much.

Resolved, That if the larger amount is tendered, as is here claimed, in recognition of the greater service of one to his country, and to honor his memory for the same, the smaller amount must be held as the measure of the service of the other, and the honor therefor, whereas the honored and the beloved head of the nation proclaimed in its moments of crucial agony: "The only debt which we can never pay is the debt of gratitude we owe to our brave soldiers."

Resolved, That it is with feelings of deep regret the members of this post find themselves called upon to dissent from the position of the distinguished comrade of their own household, so to speak, in the matter here at issue, and to be obliged to record their indorsement of the sentiments and action of the "stranger," the also distinguished comrade, from Nebraska.

Resolved, That the thanks of this post are hereby tendered to the Hon. WILLIAM V. ALLEN, Senator from Nebraska, for the interest and gallantry manifested in the cause of the widow of the common soldier as equal to that of the widow of the commissioned officer, believing such conduct inspired by the same spirit that actuated the fathers of the nation in the immortal declaration that "All men are created equal, endowed by their Creator with the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and of course all that these noble words imply.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to Senator HAWLEY, one to Senator ALLEN, and one to Congressman HENRY, of the First Congressional district of Connecticut, and that we call on the Grand Army posts of the State and nation to speak out on this most important issue and record their convictions as to whether the veterans of the late civil war, fought on behalf of the perpetuation of free institutions, are worthy of the estimate placed on their patriotic services by the martyred Lincoln, or are more fairly and accurately adjudged by the estimate and action of the majority of our present national lawgivers.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct copy of the resolutions passed as stated.

GEORGE JONES, Adjutant.

Mr. KEM. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that those are only a part of the protests that I have received from different parts of this country against this sort of pension legislation. Here is the Republican party, with 140 majority on this floor, that has posed before the people of this country for years and years as the friend of the common soldier; and I submit, and I want it to go to the people of this country, that the record shows that the Republican party is not the friend of the common soldier. Here you have come night after night, and you have made strenuous and bitter efforts and contests upon this floor to pension the widows of officers of the Army, to pension photographers and teamsters, and that sort of thing. You have been discriminating from time to time in their favor, but you have done comparatively nothing for the common soldier of this country, and I am glad of the fact that at last the common soldiers are waking up to that fact and are beginning to understand it.

I want to submit, Mr. Chairman, that this woman whose case is being considered at the very extreme is only entitled to $30 per month; and that is what she ought to have, and then she has an advantage of $26 a month over the common soldier.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, a statement has been made upon the floor of this House that we, as Republicans, can not allow to go to the country with our assent. Of all things, I believe in decency in politics, whether it is with our opponents or among ourselves. I have no objection to any pleasant badinage about gentlemen who are aspiring to the high office of President; but when a serious charge is made that these men, who have been in the Republican party for years, and by their distinguished services to this country have reached that eminence in public life that their friends throughout this country are seriously urging them for the highest office within the gift of our people, for a member of this House to get up and seriously and earnestly try to send the impression out throughout this country that these eminent gentlemen, or either one of them, through their friends, would come into this House and undertake to use the old soldiers of this country as footballs to advance his candidacy, it is not correct. I refer to the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY]. I am satisfied when he reads those remarks in cold print to-morrow morning that he will not be satisfied with them. No gentleman who is a candidate for that high office will for one moment approve remarks of that kind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the rules of this House declare that every Friday night shall be set apart for pension business. That rule has been religiously kept, and although the Private Calendar, which contains many meritorious bills for money due to the people from this Government—though our business has not been reached, although we have been in session three and a half months—this House to-day gave way and allowed the day to be taken up in the interest of these men; and I say that when a certain gentleman, whom I need not name, of high standing among the Republicans of this House, and whom we recognize as our leader, is charged with undertaking to suppress legislation in the interest of the old soldiers, I denounce that statement as being without any foundation in fact. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. MAHON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have noticed since I have been here this session when gentlemen on the floor of this House, of both parties, have approached that gentleman in his private room——

Mr. CONNOLLY. What gentleman?

Mr. MAHON. I will name him after a while, if you want me to—[continuing] and have asked him for recognition that they might have a bill passed through this House in favor of some old soldier, the rest of us who had been asking for recognition for legislation had to give way, because that gentleman, out of the kindness of his heart and his loyalty to those old soldiers, always gave the preference to gentlemen who had private pension bills. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] This House has consumed fifty-five hours on private pension bills. We have passed 40, or an average of about an hour and a half consumed on each pension bill.

Now, I am not criticising gentlemen for talking about pension bills on either side. That is the absolute and unqualified right of each gentleman under the rules of this House; but, nevertheless, the fact stands out that we have consumed on an average an hour and a half on every pension bill. Now, if gentlemen of the House propose to take up the time in talking, which they have the right to do, then pray do not let them criticise men who are not responsible.

Mr. GROUT. Let them not lay it to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MAHON. Let them not lay it to the committee. So far as the committee is concerned, I have been before them, and made requests of them, and they have always treated me with the greatest consideration, for which I thank them. But I say I do not want the statement to go out to the country that the gentleman who has presided over this House—do you know who that is?

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. TOM REED.

Mr. CONNOLLY. All the time except the Friday night sessions.

Mr. MAHON (continuing). Or his friends are undertaking to advance his interests as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States by trying to suppress pension legislation. [Loud applause.] I do not believe there is another Republican on the floor of this House, except the gentleman from Illinois, and I am sure there is not a Democrat on the floor of this House, who will charge that gentleman with conduct of that kind. [Renewed applause.]

Now, I have said enough on this subject. I simply want it to go out to the country that the man who presides in that chair is as good a friend to the soldiers of the United States as any man that lives in our land. [Applause.] To him everybody who knows anything about it will concede that—Democrats, Republicans, and other Presidential aspirants. That is all I have to say.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to have any controversy with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], but I think he probably has a tendency when he stands on his feet to say more than he would write in moments of cool, deliberate reflection. [Laughter.] I know him to be a very good friend to the soldier and I know that he was a good soldier. He and I together had the honor of putting down the principal part of the rebellion. [Laughter.] He is a good Republican, too, but I can tell him that before he arraigns the entire Republican party in this House for bad faith toward the soldiers he ought to have more details to go on than he has had thus far.

There is no trouble in this pension question except the defect in the general pension legislation of the country, and that defect has come in the lapse of time. There was a time, since I have been a member of this House, when I was opposed to some legislation that I am now distinctly in favor of. While I am on my feet I want to say that we shall not get rid of these troubles until we pass a uniform general pension law based upon honorable service. [Applause.] There are two incurable evils incident to this whole business. One of them is the accumulation of business in the Pension Office; but the great evil, the one that towers above all the rest, is the political aspect of the pension question.

I have thought a great many years about that; I have observed it, and I have stood here and stated the evil before. It is not an element in the Democratic party alone. Evils of this character will infest all political parties so long as the granting of a pension is a question of what the disability came from, how it was incurred, and how great it is. So long as those questions have to be settled by the report of an examining board and the case has to pass through this pension organization here, we can never have any successful relief from the political aspect of the business. It is a little worse in the Democratic party than it is in the Republican party, for the reason that the Republicans have most of the soldier vote, and the Democrats, from time to time, make piratical incursions into the Republican party by a system of administering and applying the pension laws and pension examinations, and in that way they push the political aspect all the time to the front.

These boards of pension examiners that go in and out with the changes and mutations of politics are not only of no benefit to the soldier, but they are a curse to the country. That is perhaps pretty severe language, but I only state the fact. We have all found it out, and we shall never get rid of the evil until we destroy the political power of the Pension Bureau, with its ramifications extending into every county in the United States, by a distinct law giving to every soldier what the Government can afford to give, based upon honorable service and upon nothing else. [Applause.] When we do that the machinery will be gotten rid of and all these questions will disappear from Congress and members can become something else than mere pension agents.

Now, what about this Invalid Pensions Committee? They have brought in a measure here that, in the main and practically in all respects, is a most valuable step forward in this matter of pensions, and I am not willing to be a member of a House, or a member of a political party, or a member of a committee, and stand by and hear an advantage taken that I know is not a fair advantage and remain silent, even though my doing so might inure to the benefit of some "fugleman," as somebody on this floor has been very politely called to-night—some fugleman of some candidate for the Presidency. I suppose we have a good many fuglemen here. I imagine that the gentleman who made the charge is a sort of a fugleman, possibly not a major-general, possibly only a corporal, but I think he will fugle some before he gets through. [Laughter.]

That measure has been brought into the House. Now, I claim to have some interest in the soldiers of the country. I look after their interests; and I am not a demagogue, either. I do not appeal for votes to the soldiers of my district or boast of anything that I do for them. If at the end of ten or twelve years spent as a Representative in Congress a man has not established a reputation by his action here, it is hardly worth while for him to set up a claim as to what he is doing for the old soldiers. They understand this thing now tolerably well.

I went to the Speaker and talked with him about this very matter, and he is not only willing, but anxious (I say it without qualification) that this bill as reported shall come up and have its fair hearing and shall be passed. He may have some suggestions to make about it. He is a Representative of his Congressional district, and he is a great leader of the Republican party here in this House. [Applause.] By no fair inference can it be said by anybody that he has laid an obstacle of any character in the way of that pension legislation. It is only justice to him that I should say this, inasmuch as I happen personally to know what I am talking about on this particular question. [Applause.]

Now, then, who is undertaking to control this House? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] ought not to send out to the country the statement that there are a few men here (whoever he may have intended to include in that statement) who control this House. It is as much as I can do to control myself; and nobody can control me.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It didn't look very much as if anybody was "controlling the House" to-day.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; there was not anybody in control here to-day; there is not anybody in control here to-night. The audience is quiet, that is all, but the House will break out again, and it will run as the majority wants it to run.

My friend from Illinois, if you want to do something, make your proposition; come to the front with it and shout. Do not stand around and charge somebody else with not doing that which you are abundantly capable of doing yourself. There are no committees of this House that are in control of it. The rules of the House give to certain committees the right of way, but the House can knock those committees out, as it did to-day. The Appropriations Committee to-day had the right of way. They had it just exactly as you have the right to walk on the street; but if there comes along a runaway team and runs over you, your right of way does not do you very much good. The Appropriations Committee got run over here to-day. [Laughter.] I voted to stand by it; I thought that the best thing to be done; and I will tell you why. Some gentlemen learned here to-day something that I learned ten years ago. I knew when we took up the Private Calendar to-day that we might just as well all have gone fishing. The first bill we struck was the last bill that we touched, as I knew would be the case. In the same time we could have passed, or nearly passed, that great appropriation bill if we had gone right ahead with it.

Now, my friends, that is all I want to say. It is not worth while to send out to the country the statement that there is a conspiracy here against the old soldier. The Republican party of this country has done for the soldier all that has ever been done for him that is worth remembering. [Applause.] And the Republican party of this country is just as faithful to the old soldier to-day as it ever was at any time in its history. The Republican party of this country, through the action of this House of Representatives, will do justice to the old soldier and will compel a recognition of that fact by the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] serves to illustrate very well the truth of the suggestion which I made when I was last on the floor, and which has been so kindly criticised by my Santa Claus friend from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] suggested that when I got on my feet I, in all probability, said things that I would not say in cooler moments, if writing them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion in connection with what he was saying, that were it not for circumstances over which he has no control he would probably be as much of a Santa Claus as I am. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Now, I was saying that the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Chairman, suggested that I probably, on my feet, said things that I would not have said had I been sitting down and writing them out. That is probably correct. I would in all likelihood have selected some different words and would have been able to make my suggestion in language more forcible, perhaps more elegant, than I did use when on my feet, called there by the bill under consideration.

But the gentleman seeks to put me in the attitude of attacking the Republican party, as not being the friend of the soldier. He certainly does not do that in sincerity and earnestness. It must be "fugling" when he does that, to use his own term. The general purport of what I said was that we were neglecting the interests of the old soldiers and at the same time pretending that we were giving strict attention to their interests at the Friday night sessions. I said that we had too many candidates for President and their fuglemen at this session of Congress to give very strict attention to the demands of the old soldiers, and in illustration of what I said I remarked that while we have a great big Republican majority on this side of the House, yet we hardly ever get a quorum at these evening sessions.

Now, gentlemen do not want me to say that, because it will go to the public. Is it true? Is it not true? Is not every word of it true, and all that I have said about it? Then, if it be true, why should we be ashamed of speaking of it? If it be true, let it be known that we are engaged too often and too much in the business of making Presidents to give strict attention to the Friday night sessions in behalf of the old soldiers of the country.

I say to the gentleman from Ohio that if I were sitting down writing this out I would probably extend it a little further; but when he and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], the latter especially, come in here like Don Quixote, armed cap-a-pie, to defend the Speaker of the House against the assault they claim that I made upon him, they are fighting a windmill. [Great laughter and applause.] And that term, Mr. Chairman, I use with the full knowledge of the fact. It is no slip of the tongue. Even if I had been sitting down and writing it, as the gentleman suggests, I would have used the term, because that is what his prototype did—fought imaginary enemies.

But, sir, I made no assault on the Speaker of the House. I have always been treated kindly by him, quite as much as my deserts entitle me to, I may state. There is not the slightest reason why I should make an assault upon him, none on earth. But the gentleman thinks I referred to him when I was interrupted by a question in the course of my remarks a few moments ago, and when I said with reference to the Committee on Rules that I would be exceedingly glad to see any member of the committee here at any of the Friday night sessions. Now, the Speaker being ex officio a member of the Committee on Rules, that remark might be construed to include him. But I have no apology to make. There was no intention of referring to him in any discourteous manner whatever.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me to put in a word there?

Mr. CONNOLLY. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. In the twelve years that I have been a member of this House I have never known any Speaker of the House of any party to be present at these Friday night sessions.

Mr. CONNOLLY. In the four or five months that I have been here my experience has been exactly the same as that of the gentleman of Ohio. [Laughter.] Now, I hope the gentleman will not compel me to put anything more before the public.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me complete what I was about to say. That it has been the uniform practice of the House always that these sessions are presided over by a member of the House selected by the Speaker for that purpose.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I have no question of that.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the Speaker has a very laborious life——

Mr. CONNOLLY. Beyond question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And it is not expected that he shall come to these evening sessions. Indeed, some of the older members might perhaps stay away with profit not only to themselves, but to the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, I notice that they very often take leave of absence from the House without its consent.

Now, I do say, Mr. Chairman, that we are to a certain extent guilty of neglect in this—not so much in the passage of the private pension bills introduced, but because here is a most excellent bill reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions that covers nine-tenths almost of all of the cases that are forced to be acted upon by special legislation, to which no attention has yet been paid. The Committee on Invalid Pensions introduced the bill, had it placed on the Calendar of the House—the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—on the 11th day of February. That bill has lain there all of that time. I have asked the chairman of the committee—I know he is anxious to get it up whenever he can find a clear way for that purpose—I have asked when it would be taken up. I know that he wants to take it up as soon as possible. That bill ought to be considered, and it will perform more real service for the soldier than all the standing up on this floor we can do in these Friday night sessions—standing here, like the gentleman from Ohio, and protesting what good friends we are of the soldier. We had better by passing that bill prove our faith and earnestness by our work. Let us take up that bill, a bill that will do some good, and put it upon its passage. That is the way to prove our friendship and good will. [Applause.]

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the other side have got through determining whether anybody has been hurt or any Presidential toes have been stepped on, it might perhaps be in order to consider what is before the House at this time. But in passing, let me ask you, do you consider it fair, do you consider it just, do you consider it very manly to jump with both feet upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] because he has had the manhood to assert what he believed to be right with regard to a private pension bill? You admit that what he asserted was right, because you passed the amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ANDREWS. I believe that the merits of the bill now under consideration are the proper subject for discussion, and that debate upon other matters is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MILES. Why was it not raised an hour ago?

Mr. CHICKERING. Because it is raised now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILES. That is a brilliant remark.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. ERDMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt the House thought it relevant a while ago, whether the eminent gentleman who presides over the House was a friend of the soldier or not, and whether the Democratic party was a friend of the old soldier or not.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ERDMAN. Yes, for a question.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Have you ever voted for a pension bill since you have been a member of the House?

Mr. ERDMAN. I have voted for a number of them, and I am going to vote for this bill, and I will tell you why. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Mr. Chairman, a while ago I was about to say that it was relevant to this bill to determine whether or not the eminent gentleman who presides here was a friend of the old soldier, and I was delighted to hear the kind tribute that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] paid, as the champion of a rival Presidential candidate; but when he undertook to say that the Democratic party was not liberal toward the old soldier he forgot the amount that Democratic Congresses have voted in every pension appropriation bill passed by them for many years. He forgot the fact that the Fifty-third Congress put more liberal pension legislation upon the statute books than the Fifty-fourth Congress has or ever will.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ERDMAN. Again, Mr. Chairman, it has been said that there is slumbering somewhere upon the Calendar—that last sleep that knows no waking, I believe the gentleman from Illinois terms it—a bill that will do away with Friday night pension legislation. Pass that bill as it is now and it will do away with the necessity for all Friday night pension legislation. It will do away with the necessity for a Pension Bureau at all. All that will be required will be scribes to write on the rolls the names of those who demand to be placed there. That is the purpose of it, and I wonder not that the Speaker stands appalled at the magnitude of the havoc it would wreak upon the Treasury. But that bill, when it is reached in its proper order, which I have no doubt will come some day—provided we do not get away from here by the 2d of May—will be criticised, probably amended, and passed with some good in it, though as it is now, in my judgment, it will never pass this House.

Now, as to the bill under consideration: The gentleman to whose widow it is sought to give a pensionable status had the rank and performed the eminent service, and his widow is dependent. What more should you want? It should entitle her to a pension such as the committee recommend. Therefore I intend to vote for it, and I hope gentlemen on the other side will not detain the House again as long in making capital for Presidential aspirants as they have been detaining it on this bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying to get a word in edgewise for some time. I introduced this bill, asking that a pension be granted to Sophia J. Hamilton. The report of the committee, which has just been read, giving the military record of General Hamilton, shows that it is a record of eminent services rendered to his country in two of its great wars.

General Hamilton was a graduate of the United States Military Academy at West Point in 1843. He served in various regiments of the Regular Army until the breaking out of the war with Mexico. He served throughout that entire war, being engaged in five of its great battles. He rendered gallant service at the battle of Molino del Rey, where he was wounded. Captain Chapman, who commanded the Fifth Infantry, in whose command he was, specially commends him for his gallant conduct on the battlefield. His record in the civil war is equally honorable and distinguished.

In May, 1861, when the civil war broke out, he led forth in defense of his country the Third Wisconsin Infantry. He was its colonel. He rose rapidly from one position to another, until in September, 1862, he was made major-general. General Grant specially commends him for his gallant conduct at the battle of Iuka, where his division did the most of the fighting. He commends him as a brave, bold, and deserving officer. Again, at the battle of Corinth, where nearly 6,000 men were killed and wounded, General Rosecrans publicly thanked him for the gallant and able manner in which he performed his duties upon the battlefield.

Now then, Mr. Chairman, when General Hamilton laid down the vocations of peace and entered into the service of his country in 1861 he was a well, strong, and healthy man. When he ceased the service of his country he was in broken health. He carried home with him diseases that were progressive, which gradually reduced him to an invalid.

Through the services he rendered to his country, from hardships and privations endured in the war, through the immense nervous strain of an active war career such as General Hamilton had, he lost his health, and he went home broken in health and gradually was reduced to a helpless invalid. On account of his invalid condition he was not able to attend to business, and thus lost most of his property, so that when he died he left his widow in dependent circumstances.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is no more than just to grant to the widow of General Hamilton, now 71 years old, this pension in recognition of the honorable and distinguished services he rendered to his country; and I hope this Congress will treat the widow of Major-General Hamilton as generously as they have the widow of any other major or brigadier general. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

FREDERICK VAN GUILDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3046) for the relief of Frederick Van Guilder.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing against Frederick Van Guilder upon the records of Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Volunteers, and to issue to him an honorable discharge, to date July 6, 1863.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The report (by Mr. PARKER) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3046) for the relief of Frederick Van Guilder, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully recommend that the bill do pass without amendment.

This is a bill to remove the charge of desertion and to issue an honorable discharge to date July 6, 1863.

The soldier enlisted September, 1862, was mustered November 5, 1862, and served till July 6, 1863, receiving no pay, because his name was not on the muster rolls, which appear to have been mislaid.

After serving through Gettysburg he surrendered to the provost-marshal to ascertain his status, and was discharged as not mustered in, by the Provost-Marshal-General; went home, and afterwards reenlisted and served faithfully, and was honorably discharged from the last service.

His statement in affidavit on the records of the War Department, and in the ingenuous autograph paper, of which a copy is annexed, is confirmed by these records as to the loss of muster rolls, the service, the want of pay, and that it was decided by the Provost-Marshal-General that he had not been mustered in.

The committee are of opinion that he had good warrant to go home and was not a deserter. Desertion is a question of intent. He is entitled to an honorable discharge, as provided in the bill.

Case of Frederick Van Guilder, Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Volunteers.

WAR DEPARTMENT, RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
January 28, 1896.

It is shown by the records on file in this office that Frederick Van Guilder was enrolled on September 5, 1862, and that he was mustered into service as a private of Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Volunteers, to serve three years, on November 5, 1862, at Albany, N. Y., by a regularly appointed mustering officer of the United States. He is borne as present with his command on all rolls of his company up to and including that for June 30, 1863. The next roll, that for August 31, 1863, reports him as absent without leave since July 6, 1863, and he is reported as absent on all subsequent rolls, except the muster-out roll of his company, which is dated June 8, 1865. On this roll he is reported as having deserted July 6, 1863.

It does not appear that the soldier received any pay from the time he enlisted until he left the service, and it is evident from the official records and from testimony that has been submitted to this Department that the fact of his having been mustered into service on November 5, 1862, was not communicated to his company officers until after he left his command on July 6, 1863.

On February 20, 1865, he enlisted to serve one year in Company A, Eighth Vermont Infantry, in violation of the twenty-second (now fiftieth) article of war, and was honorably discharged from that regiment on June 28, 1865.

In support of an application for removal of the charge of desertion from the One hundred and twenty-third New York Volunteers, Van Guilder has stated under oath that he served for many months without receiving any pay, that payment was refused him on the ground that the rolls did not show that he had been mustered into service, and that both he and his company officers were unaware that he had been mustered into service. This statement is corroborated to a certain extent by the official records and by the testimony of comrades which is on file in this Department; but, unfortunately, the soldier did not remain with his command until his case could have been adjudicated by the proper authorities, but abandoned the service without proper authority and went home, thereby making it necessary that the charge of desertion should be entered against him upon the records when his company officers discovered that he actually was mustered into the military service on November 5, 1862.

In view of the facts of record in this case, which do not conflict in any important particular with the statements made by the applicant and his witnesses, the War Department is unable to afford any relief under the provisions of the act approved March 2, 1889, which is the only law now in force governing the subject of removal of charges of desertion.

Respectfully submitted.

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
Washington City, February 3, 1896.

SIR: In returning herewith the copy of the statement by Mr. Frederick Van Guilder, received by your reference on the 30th ultimo with the request to be furnished with certain information relative to the muster into service of Frederick Van Guilder, late of Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Infantry, and with the affidavits on file in this Department in his case, I am directed by the Secretary of War to inform you as follows:

No record has been found showing that shortly after the battle of Gettysburg this soldier reported to a provost-marshal, as alleged.

Upon a reexamination of the records of the provost-marshal at Baltimore, Md., it has been ascertained that under the name Fred Vangilder he was confined in the Gilmore House July 19, 1863, as an arrested deserter, with remark "not mustered in."

The "Letters Received Book," First Division, Twelfth Army Corps, shows that on June 11, 1863, H. O. Wiley, captain, One hundred and twenty-third New York Infantry, requested that Private Van Guilder be mustered into the United States service, and that on the following day Captain Wiley's communication was forwarded for information. The records of the Twelfth Army Corps furnish no additional information in the case.

There is no muster and descriptive roll in the case on file in this office, the muster roll of his company, dated August 31, 1863, being the basis for the statement that Van Guilder was mustered into service November 5, 1862, at Albany, N. Y.

An exhaustive investigation fails to elicit any further information in regard to the soldier as a member of Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Volunteers, additional to that contained in the report on H. R. bill No. 3046, Fifty-first Congress, first session. It appears, however, that on February 20, 1865, he enlisted for one year in Company A, Eighth Vermont Infantry, and was honorably discharged from that regiment on June 28, 1865.

If he was not in the military service as of Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Infantry, he could not, of course, be a deserter therefrom, and would not therefore be entitled to the benefits accruing from military service rendered therein, but whatever informality there may have been in the record of this man's muster into service it is evident that he was, at least constructively, mustered in, and was in the military service as a member of that regiment and a technical deserter therefrom.

Following is a synopsis of the testimony on file in the case:

March 27, 1890, the soldier testified that he enlisted as a private in Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Infantry, on or about September 5, 1862, at Granville, N. Y., but was not mustered into service until "about the last days of September, 1862, at Albany"; that his muster rolls could not be found, and the paymaster refused to pay him "on the grounds that I had not been mustered in," and said that "he could not muster me unless I enlisted over again, which would have caused me to lose all my pay"; that thinking he had served long enough without pay, he left his command, with his captain's consent, after the battle of Gettysburg; that he surrendered to the provost guard and was taken to the provost-marshal-general at Baltimore, but the latter officer, failing to find his muster-in papers, sent him home; and that not until many years after the war did he (soldier) know that he had been mustered into service.

Cassius G. Waite, aged 43 years, of Granville, N. Y., testified, May 23, 1890, that he was well acquainted with Van Guilder before his enlistment, and served with him in Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Infantry; that Van Guilder left the service at the battle of Gettysburg, about July 3, 1863, because his captain (H. O. Wiley) refused to issue him any clothing, and for the further reason that "he was not known on the muster rolls of said company and the Government," and that "he heard Major-General Williams, division commander of Twelfth Corps, tell claimant not to fight unless the Government paid him, and to go home."

George W. Baker, late captain Company K, One hundred and twenty-third New York Infantry, testified September 15, 1890, that he was second lieutenant of the company at the date of Van Guilder's enlistment therein; that Van Guilder enlisted November 5, 1862, was mustered into service November 5, 1862, and left the regiment July 10, 1863; that the captain of the company (Henry O. Wiley) wrote several times to the adjutant-general of the State of New York for the mustering papers of the soldier, but was unable to obtain them, and that he was, therefore, "unable to get his pay or to find out whether he was a soldier or not"; and that on July 25, 1863, he (affiant) was detailed on detached service after drafted men in New York, and that on reaching Albany he obtained from the adjutant-general's office the mustering papers of Van Guilder and of two other members of the command and forwarded them to the regiment.

It is proper to add that a synopsis of the testimony should have been embraced in the report on bill H. R. 3046, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, but was inadvertently omitted therefrom.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, United States Army, Chief Record and Pension Office.

Hon. R. WAYNE PARKER,
Chairman Subcommittee B, Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

No. 1.

I have been requested to write a statement about my case. I inlisted about the last of September 1862 about three oclock in the after noon, in the one hundred and twenty third Nnew York in the town of Granvill Washington. Co: N. Y. and the rigment was in camp in Saylum about twenty miles away I took the train the next morning and I payed my own fair down to Saylum and the rigment had gon and what to do I did not know and then I and two more comrade payed my own fair back agane and reported to the recurting officer and he said that he would recurt some more and send us on with som more in a little while we had to wait about two weeks and then we was sent to Albany and stayed there about three weeks and I must have been mustured in while I was in Albany and then I was sent on to my rigment they was incamp in lodan valley I was with my rigment about three munts when the pay master com around and the capten said to me you cant draw any pay you have not been mustured into U. S. survis yet and you cant draw any pay but you com and sign thee pay rowl and I will try and get it for you and I thought it would be all right so I kepted right on doing survis and after the battle of chancevell the pay master came around again and the captain came around again and says you ant been mustered in the U. S. survis and he had the lutenent take me and the other two boys over to Gen. williams head quarters to be mustered and we went over three different times and the mustering officer said that he could not muster us in without we would inlist over again.

And Gen. Williams said boys dont you fight without uncle Sam pays you and it seemed puty tuff to see the other boys get payed off and we could not get none and a wife and child at home. And it was known all thrugh the rigment that us three boys was not mustered in to United states survis. And we was advised by the other boys and som of the officers to go home. then the captain com to the ordley and said dont you call Fred C. G. and cashus weight nor Irey hall names any more at rowl call and dont draw any more clothing for them and have them turn their Guns and equitments over to you and shortly after that orders came for us to march to Getes Berg and just before we got to Getesberg one of the boys was sick and I took his aquitment and fell into the ranks and I was in the first days fight at Getesberg and then the captain come to me and the other two boys and say if you should get killed here you would not get nothing for it and your family would not get nothing eather and he sent us back to tack care of his horse and send ther man that was taking care of his horse to the rigment but I did hate to leave the boys but I thought of the love ones at home and I thought I better go back and after the battle was over we started after Gen lee Across the patomic and then I went to the captain and I said cap this Is puty tuff the knees was out of my pants and my toes was thrugh my shoes and I toled hm that I was agoig to give my elf up to the prol of guard and see if I was a soldier or a sitizen and he said he could not help it.

And I and one of the other boys started for Getesberg and was taken up by the prol of gard and taken to Getesberg before the prol marchal and was sent from there to baltmore before the prol marchal general and he said boys what are you here for and we told him that we was not mustered in to united states survis, and uncle sam would pay us we went on and told him how we inlisted and he swore out with a noath what kind of a captan we had but he said that he would telegraph to washington and find out whather we had been mustered in or not and the next day he called us up before him agane he said boys we cant find any mustering roles agants you and he said that the government did not want us to work for nothing and he said that if we would stay and do gard duty he would try and get our pay for us or he would give us a pass for home and he said boys you ant got any money how are you going to get home so he give us a pas for home I worked part of my way through and walked part and got home and that fall our lutenent com home a recruting and I see him a number times and he said to me one day fred i wish you could go back with me I told him that I would like to go back with him but I did not like to go back and go through what I did before now that fall he went back to his rigment and he stoped into Albany and fownd my mustering rowles agansted me and he sent them on to the captain but I did not know any thing about this untill about nine years ago I went back east and went and seen lutenent baker and he told me about finding the mustering rolles and sending them on

And he said that the captain put me down as a deserter but he said that he was ofle sorry and he said Fred you was one of our best soldiers and any thing I can do for you I will do it for you ought to have your pay for the time that you served this thing the last nine years has wored me to have them think that I was a dezerter for I was honest in the matter but I inlisted agane in the eight V. T. and staid with them untill the wore was over and got my discharge and now I donot get any pention nor pay for the time that I did sirve respectfuly yours FREDICK VAN GUILDER.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the reading? Do gentlemen desire the whole record read in such a case as this? It is a perfectly plain case, which I can state in a moment. We annexed all the affidavits and papers, so that the case should be fully set out. Frederick Van Guilder enlisted in New York in September, 1862, and seems to have been mustered in Albany, just as the regiment was leaving, in November, 1862. The muster rolls got lost. He served all the time until Gettysburg, but got no pay, and had nothing to send home. He had a wife and children at home. When he applied for pay they told him that he was not on any muster roll. He served through Gettysburg, and waited until the Army chased the enemy across the Potomac, and then, as he could get nothing, he wanted to find out his standing, and surrendered to the provost-marshal, and the provost-marshal sent him to the general provost-marshal at Baltimore. The provost-marshal general kept him until he could send to Washington to see whether he was mustered. On doing so, it was found he was not mustered in, and he was told that he could go home. He went home, and about a year afterwards he enlisted again, in another regiment, and served throughout the war.

Now, this is his own story. We have looked it up, and we find that he was mustered, but the muster rolls never did get to the regiment until after the battle of Gettysburg, and then after they arrived he was marked as a deserter. The provost-marshal at Baltimore, opposite the name of Frederick Van Guilder, has in the record the mark, "Not mustered in." He was not really a deserter. He had been told to go home because it appeared that he was not mustered. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. ERDMAN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly. I would like to answer the gentleman any question he desires to ask.

Mr. ERDMAN. That is a satisfactory explanation of the reason why he went home. But what explanation is there for thirty-three years' delay?

Mr. PARKER. This, sir, that Mr. Van Guilder did not find out that he was marked as a deserter until he got quite old and poor and applied for a pension.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ELIZABETH MARSHALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1109) granting a pension to Elizabeth Marshall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Marshall, of Bridgman, Mich., widow of Henry L. Marshall, a private in Company A, One hundred and eighty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1109) granting a pension to Elizabeth Marshall, having carefully considered the same, respectfully report:

Elizabeth Marshall claims as the widow of Henry L. Marshall, who enlisted September 2, 1861, in Company K, Fifty-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and was discharged for disability December 24, 1862. On March 10, 1864, he enlisted in Company A, One hundred and eighty-fourth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and died October 23, 1864, at Andersonville, Ga., of scorbutus.

On June 21, 1865, the claimant filed application as widow of the soldier, and on November 16, 1865, Margaret Ann Marshall filed application, claiming as widow also. An investigation was made into the merits of the two claims, and in 1869 Elizabeth's was allowed at $12, to date from the soldier's death. This she continued to draw until 1884.

In 1884 Margaret renewed her claim, and Elizabeth was notified that if she did not produce within sixty days some additional evidence as to the legality of her marriage her name would be dropped from the rolls. At the time the pensioner was sick in Illinois and could do nothing. Her name was accordingly dropped and the pension granted to Margaret.

It appears that in 1852 Marshall and others were at a dance given by some one in the town in which he lived, and a mock marriage was proposed. Marshall and Margaret were willing to participate in the ceremony, and did so, but all parties were drunk, including the justice of the peace who officiated.

In 1858 the soldier married Elizabeth in due form, had four children by her, always recognized her as his wife, lived with her when at home, and sent her his pay while in the service. During all this time the parties resided in the same little town of 300 or 400 inhabitants.

Margaret died in 1889, and no pension is now being paid on account of the death of the soldier. Elizabeth is more than 60 years of age, and in destitute circumstances.

Your committee are of opinion, in view of all the facts, that Elizabeth is the legal widow of the soldier, and more especially so as the question was investigated within a short time after the transactions occurred and thus decided, and remained res judicata for fifteen years.

We therefore respectfully recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. ERDMAN. I should like to get a little more information with regard to these double widows before we are called to pass upon this question.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be glad to answer any questions the gentleman desires to ask in regard to the bill.

Mr. ERDMAN. I understand from this report that the mock-marriage widow drew the pension for many years.

Mr. THOMAS. She drew the pension from 1887, I think, for a few years. Elizabeth was drawing the pension prior to that time. She was the real widow, and had four children. The soldier sent his pay during the war to her. Then this other woman came in and proved this marriage at the dance, and thereupon the Bureau required Elizabeth to prove her marriage. She was unable to do it at that time, being away from home and away from where she could secure evidence, so the pension was awarded to the other woman. She has since died, and Elizabeth now asks Congress to give her the pension that she drew for many years.

Mr. ERDMAN. That is, as I understand the report, the real widow drew the pension from 1865 to 1884.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ERDMAN. And from 1884 to 1889 the mock-marriage widow drew the pension, and now this is a proposition to place the real widow on the pension roll.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the case.

Mr. ERDMAN. You say further in your report that the question was investigated and remained res adjudicata for fifteen years. To what does that refer?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not understand the gentleman's question. Does he want a definition of that term? I understand that they lived together as man and wife for fifteen years prior to the soldier's enlistment.

Mr. ERDMAN. But you say in your report that "the question was investigated a short time after the transaction occurred and thus decided and remained res adjudicata for fifteen years." Now, what does that refer to?

Mr. THOMAS. It means that it was settled that Elizabeth was the widow.

Mr. ERDMAN. In what judicial proceeding was that determined?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know about that. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ERDMAN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 7.

Mr. ERDMAN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. [Applause.]

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOPKINS having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration sundry private bills, and had directed him to report them to the House with various recommendations.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be ordered on the bills favorably reported from the Committee of the Whole, to the engrossment, third reading, and passage; and that fifteen minutes' debate be allowed on each side.

Mr. ERDMAN. I object to that.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROSIUS, for this evening, on account of important business.

To Mr. ARNOLD of Rhode Island, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BULL, for twelve days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HUFF, for one week from Monday, on account of important business.

The hour of half past 10 having arrived, the Speaker pro tempore, pursuant to the resolution previously adopted, declared the House adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations required by the several Departments of the Government to complete the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for the postal service—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report in reply to joint resolution No. 32, Fifty-fourth Congress, directing the Secretary of War to submit estimates for necessary repairs at Cleveland Harbor, Ohio—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2017) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon to the Allen M. Harmon Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Northville, Mich., reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1399) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported two amendments concerning the Potomac Flats, intended to be proposed to the District appropriation bill, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on the 16th instant, concerning the salary of the superintendent or clerk in charge of stations where any post-office is consolidated with any office so as to become a station or substation of the same, intended to be proposed to the Post-Office appropriation bill, to report it favorably and submit a report thereon. I move that the proposed amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2199) to regulate the delivery of short-paid mail matter, to submit an adverse report thereon and recommend its indefinite postponement; but inasmuch as the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] introduced the bill, it had perhaps better go on the Calendar and await a motion of indefinite postponement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2572) to incorporate the Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6614) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, to report it with amendments, and to submit a written report, which I ask to have printed.

I give notice that to-morrow, at some convenient hour, interrupting as little as I can the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] in the management of his bill, I shall ask for the consideration of the appropriation bill which I have just reported.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to state to the Senator from Iowa that I have given notice that I shall take the floor to-morrow morning after the morning hour on the Du Pont case.

Mr. ALLISON. I give the Senator absolute assurance that I shall not interrupt him in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed under the rule, and the bill placed on the Calendar.

PUNISHMENT OF INDIANS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted, to report it favorably with amendments. I desire to state that it is a bill similar to a measure which, I believe, passed both Houses of Congress heretofore, but it did not reach the President in season to be signed. The amendment has already passed the Senate within a few days as a separate bill. I ask that the bill may be now put upon its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read.

Mr. VEST. Will the chairman of the Judiciary Committee be kind enough to explain what those sections are? It seems to me, without a reference to them, that the proposed act virtually abolishes capital punishment within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. It abolishes capital punishment except in the cases of treason, murder, and rape.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, from the reading at the desk I inferred that the jury could recommend imprisonment for life.

Mr. HOAR. No; it is the same act we passed last winter after a full explanation, and in the cases of treason, murder, and rape that capital punishment is retained. In all other cases imprisonment at hard labor for life is inflicted where the cases are now capital. In the cases of treason, murder, and rape the jury may annex to their verdict the words "without capital punishment," and in those cases the punishment is to be imprisonment for life.

Mr. HALE. Does that apply to the three deepest crimes which are named, and so abolish capital punishment?

Mr. HOAR. It does.

Mr. HALE. It does, as the Senator says, abolish capital punishment?

Mr. HOAR. Where the offense of treason is committed and if there is a verdict "without capital punishment," capital punishment is abolished. So of murder, and so of rape.

Mr. HALE. It is left to the jury.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, it is left to the jury, as in a great many States now. Then, as to the added section, the statute passed in 1885 extended the punishment for offenses committed off Indian reservations in certain enumerated cases, and among them rape, to offenses committed on Indian reservations. So the judge has no discretion where the offense of rape is committed on an Indian reservation but to sentence the prisoner to death; and there are several cases now pending where that must happen. One of the judges, a judge from Idaho, Judge Beatty, formerly, I believe, a member of the other House, wrote to me that there are several cases now upon trial before him of boys who did not seem to understand that they had committed any very heinous offense, and admitted the offense readily without any attempt to conceal it whatever, and he has to sentence those poor creatures to death.

Mr. HALE. When was this bill reported?

Mr. HOAR. At the last session of the last Congress.

Mr. HALE. But the present bill?

Mr. HOAR. At this moment. The reason why I ask present consideration is because we have a communication from the Attorney-General stating that it is very important indeed that it shall be passed before the 6th of April, because there are some cases that ought to be brought under it, or otherwise the death penalty must be inflicted.

Let me repeat; this is not new legislation brought in here in haste and asked to be passed through at once. It was passed, on full consideration by both Houses in the last Congress, but failed to reach the President in time.

Mr. HALE. I merely wish to say that I have no desire to delay the matter much. I am in full accord with the committee on their proposition relating to capital punishment. I should like an opportunity to look at the bill, which I have not had, and therefore I ask that it may go over for a day. It need not go to the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed as proposed to be amended, and the Senator from Massachusetts can call it up at any time.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I will ask leave to make this same request for its consideration at this time to-morrow morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill having been printed in the meantime and laid on the table.

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Let it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made.

Mr. HOAR. And I shall ask leave to make this same request to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOAR subsequently said: I reported this morning a bill from the Judiciary Committee in regard to the death penalty, and several Senators desired to have it printed and it went over. I had asked for its present consideration. I should like to have the bill recommitted, so that I may report it again in the morning hour to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). If there be no objection, the bill referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts will be recommitted as requested.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2657) to retire and pension employees of the Light-House Establishment and Life-Saving Service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2661) granting a pension to Henry Charles; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2662) granting a pension to Alfred H. Burr; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2663) granting an increase of pension to John Campbell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2664) granting an increase of pension to Lafayette Wood; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2665) granting an increase of pension to James White; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2666) to remove charge of desertion from the naval record of Edward Hurley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2667) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Engelberth Bensinger; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2668) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Ambrose B. Jeffries, alias Henry O'Connell; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (for Mr. VOORHEES) introduced a bill (S. 2669) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Andrew J. Dixon, deceased, late a private in Company A, Twenty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and to show that he died in said service in line and discharge of duty; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2670) to amend section 6 of the act of March 3, 1891, chapter 517, establishing circuit courts of appeals; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 2671) providing for the election of a Delegate from the District of Alaska to the House of Representatives of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S. 2672) granting a pension to John J. Shockey; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2673) granting a pension to Eliza Rosenfeldt; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 2674) granting a pension to Levi R. Long; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 2675) to punish the false publication of awards for merit and medals to exhibitors at the World's Columbian Exposition; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 2676) for the relief of Capt. John T. Bruen, of the State of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. QUAY (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2677) to provide for the securing of plans and for the erection of the public buildings of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2678) to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of James Monroe at Fredericksburg, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. QUAY (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 117) increasing the limit of cost for the erection of the appraisers' warehouse building in the city of New York, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CAFFERY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEORGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON THE UNIVERSITY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FRYE. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 5,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the University of the United States on the bill creating such university.

The order does not require to go to the Committee on Printing, owing to the fact that the printing will not cost $500.

The order was agreed to.

ECONOMIC GEOLOGY OF THE MERCUR MINING DISTRICT.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, at the earliest day practicable, 5,000 copies, in separate form, with paper covers, of the paper entitled "Economic geology of the Mercur mining district," being a part of the Sixteenth Annual Report of the United States Geological Survey, with accompanying illustrations; of which 2,500 copies shall be for the use of the House, 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 500 copies for distribution by the Geological Survey.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 28th instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 789) for the relief of Kate Winter;

An act (S. 732) to regulate the issue and recording of the commissions of officers in several of the Departments;

An act (S. 990) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealers of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes";

An act (S. 2251) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 75) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints.

OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATES.

Mr. HALE. Is there not some morning business coming over?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a resolution on the table that the Chair will lay before the Senate. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported on the 27th instant by Mr. HALE from the Committee on Printing, as follows:

Resolved, That Theodore F. Shuey is hereby appointed Official Reporter for reporting the proceedings and debates of the Senate until further order of the Senate, subject to all the duties and obligations of the contract made with D. F. Murphy, deceased, late Reporter of the Senate, and to the supervision and control of the Committee on Printing on behalf of the Senate in all respects therein provided, and to receive payment for such service according to law.

Mr. HALE. I move an amendment to the resolution. After the name "Theodore F. Shuey," strike out the word "is" and insert "and Edward V. Murphy are," and strike out the word "Reporter" and insert "Reporters," so as to read:

Resolved, That Theodore F. Shuey and Edward V. Murphy are hereby appointed Official Reporters, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

STEAMER MATTEAWAN.

Mr. HILL. In behalf of my colleague [Mr. MURPHY], who is ill and confined to the house, I ask consent to call up the bill (H. R. 4698) to provide an American register for the steamer Matteawan. The bill has passed the other House; the steamer wants to sail, and it will take only a few moments to pass the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OPERATORS OF MILITARY TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. QUAY. Before proceeding with the current business, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up the bill (S. 319) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war of the rebellion. It is a bill which has been twice reported favorably in the Senate, and once passed the Senate without opposition.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 4, after the word "served," to insert "not less than ninety days"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to prepare a roll of all persons who served not less than ninety days in the operation of military telegraph lines during the late civil war and to issue to each, upon application, unless it appears that his service was not creditably performed, or to the representatives of those who are dead, suitable certificates of honorable service in the military telegraph corps of the Army of the United States, stating the service rendered, the length of such service, and the dates, as near as may be, between which such service was performed: Provided, That this law shall not be construed to entitle the persons herein mentioned to any pay, pension, bounty, or rights not herein specifically provided for.

Mr. PLATT. The object of the bill is simply——

Mr. QUAY. It is simply to give them a military status.

Mr. PLATT. It gives them a certificate of service.

Mr. QUAY. That is all. A similar bill passed the Senate in the last Congress and passed the other House, but did not reach the President in time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of telegraph operators who served in the war of the rebellion."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 502.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me that I may call up a little pension bill?

Mr. BERRY. I will yield to the Senator from Illinois, but I should like to have permission to state to the Senate that I have this day promised me for the consideration of the unfinished business, and I hope that after the bill the Senator from Illinois calls up is considered the unfinished business will be proceeded with.

Mr. CULLOM. This little pension bill will not take a minute.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask the Senator from Arkansas if he will also consent to the consideration of a little bill. It is under peculiar circumstances that I want to ask the Senator to yield to me.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is a bill reported by the Committee on Claims respecting a Senate employee who has been crippled for life and seriously injured here in the elevator, and the only chance of getting it through Congress is to take action at once. It will lead to no debate, and I should like to ask unanimous consent for its passage.

Mr. BERRY. After the Senator from Illinois is through I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PLATT. I suggest that the Senate, by unanimous consent, take up the bill to which the Senator from Arkansas refers, and then he will yield to these two matters.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand it is up.

Mr. BERRY. It is up, and I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I am much obliged.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois for the purpose of calling up a bill.

UZZIEL B. CHURCH.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 711) to increase the pension of Uzziel B. Church.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension rolls the name of Uzziel B. Church, late of Company

D, Eleventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and late of Company I, Sixteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $20 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS WILLIAMS.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 517) for the relief of Thomas Williams, an employee of the Senate folding room, for injuries received while in the discharge of his duties in the year 1892.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "dollars," to strike out "three thousand" and insert "one thousand five hundred"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500 to Thomas Williams, who was injured while in the discharge of his duties as an employee of the Senate folding room in the year 1892.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the time, and passed.

BENJAMIN F. HOWLAND.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1565) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Howland.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Idaho will let that go over for the time being. I dislike to refuse consent, but I have only this day for the consideration of the unfinished business. If it is delayed longer this morning it may be impossible to get through with it to-day. However, I will yield to the Senator from Idaho.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Benjamin F. Howland, late of the whale ship Edward, Mexican war.

Mr. HOAR. What is the title to a pension on which the bill rests?

Mr. SHOUP. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. SHOUP on the 10th instant, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1565) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Howland, have examined the same and report:

The claimant made application for pension under the Mexican war service pension act of January 29, 1887, alleging that he enlisted in the United States service at St. Joseph, Gulf of California, in 1846, as a sailor on the ship Edward, commanded by Capt. John S. Barker. His claim was rejected in the Pension Bureau on the ground that the records fail to show that he was enlisted in the naval or military service of the United States.

The beneficiary is one of the survivors of the crew of the ship Edward, several of whom have been pensioned by special act of Congress, notably Charles H. Perry, June 20, 1890, and George James, February 23, 1891; and the widow of Charles Peirce, August 9, 1894.

The following extract from the report of the Committee on Pensions in the House of Representatives, Fifty-first Congress, first session, in the case of Charles H. Perry, above mentioned, contains the data relative to the service rendered the Government by the crew of the ship Edward:

"The claimant made application to the Pension Bureau March 24, 1887, for a pension under the Mexican war service act of January 29, 1887, declaring that while serving as fourth mate on the United States whaling ship Edward, commanded by Capt. John S. Barker, the ship touched the shores of Mexico at a place called San Joseph, where they were spoken by a trading sloop to go to the rescue of the garrison at said place, which was in the possession of our American troops (28 men), but which was surrounded by several hundred Mexicans, cutting off the water front.

"The whaling ship Magnolia dropped anchor near the Edward, and at the request of the garrison the forces of the two ships were combined, making a force of about 60 men, who landed, drove the enemy back, and remained there until the U. S. S. Relief relieved them. In order to perform the service above named the ships Edward and Magnolia were left in charge of two men each, and the landing force marched 1½ miles to reach the garrison. After relief came the ship Edward took dispatches to Commodore Shubrick, who was stationed at Matzland with the squadron. Commodore Shubrick returned thanks in behalf of the Government for the service rendered by the Edward on that occasion, and at his request the Edward carried fixed ammunition, shells, etc., back to the garrison.

"The official report of the United States Fish Commission for 1875-76 contains at the bottom of page 113 the following statement:

"'The London Mercantile Gazette of October 22, 1852, said: The number of American ships engaged in the Southern whale fisheries alone would of themselves be nearly sufficient to man any ordinary fleet of ships of war which that country might require to send to sea. Instances are not wanting, indeed, where whalemen have undertaken yeoman service for their country. Thus in November, 1846, Captain Simmons, of the Magnolia, and Capt. John E. Barker, of the Edward, both of New Bedford, hearing that the garrison of San Jose, Lower California, was in imminent danger, landed their crews and marched to its relief,' etc.

"On page 421 of the same volume a table showing returns of whaling vessels sailing from American ports has a marginal note mentioning the fact that Captain Barker, of the Edward, marched with his crew to the relief of the garrison of San Jose in 1846.

"Your committee believe, however, that in view of the service rendered by which the garrison of San Jose and the lives of more than a score of men were probably saved to the Government, the claim is an exceptionally meritorious one, and should be so recognized by the passage of the bill."

In a letter from the collector of customs at the port of New Bedford, Mass., he states "upon examination of the original crew list of bark Edward, of this port, which cleared July 14, 1845, on a whaling voyage, the name of Benjamin F. Howland appears, and is thus described: "Benjamin F. Howland, born in New Bedford, Mass.; aged 17 years; 5 feet 5 inches in height; light complexion; brown hair."

The claimant is 68 years of age, and from the affidavits of two of his neighbors it appears that he is suffering from rheumatism and disease of the kidneys and bowels.

In view of the precedents established by pensioning the survivors above referred to, and pensioning the widow of a member of the crew, your committee believe that the relief prayed for should be granted, and the passage of the bill is therefore recommended.

Mr. HOAR. I think that——

Mr. BERRY. If the bill leads to discussion I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. HOAR. I have the floor, and it will take but a moment. I suggest that it be amended. I move to amend by inserting after the word "Edward," in the sixth line, the words "for important services rendered in the"; so as to read:

Late of the whaleship Edward, for important services rendered in the Mexican war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADJUSTMENT OF CLAIMS WITH ARKANSAS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the bill be read in full.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Before that is done I desire to state that I had intended to call up the privileged question, but I shall give way to the Senator from Arkansas for to-day only, as he has been insisting for some time on getting his bill up and it has been the unfinished business. But I give notice that unless he can conclude the bill to-day I shall have to proceed to-morrow with the privileged case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the compromise and settlement effected February 23, 1895, between the United States and the State of Arkansas by John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, and Hoke Smith, Secretary of the Interior, on behalf of the United States, and James P. Clarke, governor of Arkansas, on behalf of that State, which was made under and by virtue of the authority conferred by an act of Congress approved August 4, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas," and the act of the general assembly of Arkansas approved April 8, 1889, authorizing the governor to act for that State, be, and the same is hereby, approved and given the full force and effect of law.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I am glad to know that the time has come when there is a reasonable probability that a vote can be had upon the pending measure. For more than fifteen years the State of Arkansas, through her legislature, through her governor, and by her delegation in both Houses of Congress, has been striving to get the indebtedness of the State of Arkansas to the United States and the indebtedness of the United States to the State of Arkansas settled, adjusted, and compromised. My predecessor here, Mr. Garland, introduced a bill in, I think, every Congress of which he was a member. My colleague in the House, Mr. MCRAE, has devoted ten years of his public life here in earnest effort to bring about some kind of a settlement of this long-standing claim of the United States and the State of Arkansas, and it was solely due to his energy, his intelligence, his love for his State, and his perseverance that the act of 1894, referred to in the present bill, was passed.

The act of 1894, approved the 4th of August, provided that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior on behalf of the United States and the governor of Arkansas on behalf of the State of Arkansas should settle, compromise, and adjust all claims that the Government might have against the State and all claims that the State might make against the Government. In pursuance of that law the then governor of our State came to Washington and had an interview with the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury, but they were unable, from some cause or other, to consider the matter at that time.

Subsequently, under the authority contained in the act, the Secretary of the Treasury named an expert in the office, who was, I think, the chief of division, Mr. Doyle, and the Secretary of the Interior named a law clerk in his office—his name, I think, was Mr. Ross—to proceed to the State of Arkansas to investigate the State land records, to take testimony in all the claims that Arkansas might present, to examine the public-land laws here in the Land Office and the Treasury Department, and make a full statement of what would be a just, fair compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Those experts went to the State of Arkansas, took the testimony of some sixty-five witnesses, thoroughly examined all the records, and made a report to the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury, and that report, after being thoroughly considered by them, was adopted, and the present governor of Arkansas. Governor Clarke, accepted the terms laid down in that report and agreed to by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury, and Governor Clarke came to Washington and the agreement was signed by those officers thus representing the United States Government, and the governor, representing the State, and it is that agreement which this bill seeks to confirm and ratify.

I want the Senate to understand before I go into the character of these claims that if this bill passes it will forever settle all claims that the Government of the United States may have against the State of Arkansas or that the State may have against the General Government. I want the Senate to understand fully that under this bill the State of Arkansas will relinquish to the United States claims for more than a million acres of swamp lands. It will relinquish all claims for land taken by way of indemnity under the swamp-land act; all claims for money indemnity under the acts of 1855 and 1857; all claims for indemnity for school land; all claims for 5 per cent upon public lands to which the State was entitled by the act of admission as were other public-land States, and, in addition, I wish to say that she will be required to pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $160,572. This will be the result if the bill becomes a law.

In regard to the character of the claims that the United States holds against the State of Arkansas there has been much misrepresentation and much misstatement which has gone to the country and which has come to the Senate. Two anonymous pamphlets have been issued and sent here recently. One of those pamphlets, which is copied from a newspaper from beginning to end, is full of misrepresentations in regard to this claim.

This indebtedness of the State of Arkansas to the United States came about in this way: Soon after the admission of Arkansas to the Union, in 1836, she, unfortunately for herself, passed a law by which she authorized the issuance of $2,000,000 of Arkansas bonds to be loaned to a real-estate bank established in that State.

Mr. PLATT. What year was that?

Mr. BERRY. The State was admitted in 1836; the legislative act authorizing the issuance of these bonds, to be guaranteed by the State of Arkansas, was passed in 1837. The bonds were to aid in the establishment of what was known as the Real Estate Bank in the State of Arkansas. The Government of the United States held at that time money which had been received from Mr. Smithson, which had been given by him for the establishment of the Smithsonian Institution. The Secretary of the Treasury invested that money in bonds of several States, including some of the bonds issued by the State of Arkansas to the Real Estate Bank. Five hundred and thirty-eight bonds, each for the sum of $1,000, were purchased with the Smithson money at, I think, 99½ cents on the dollar. That money was invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in those bonds issued by the State of Arkansas to aid the Real Estate Bank in that State.

In addition to that, the Secretary of the Treasury invested $90,000 of what was known as the Chickasaw national fund and $3,000 more of what was known as the Chickasaw orphan fund in these Arkansas bonds, making a total of $631,000 of bonds, for which the State of Arkansas was liable.

Mr. President, I wish to say here that so far as the State itself is concerned and so far as the great body of its people are concerned, it has never been the beneficiary of a single solitary cent arising from the issuance of these bonds. I do not mention this for the purpose of showing that the State is not liable to the Government for the bonds or for the purpose of showing that the Government was in any way liable for the failure of the Real Estate Bank, from which the State suffered; but I state it in order to meet the false charge which has been made in the anonymous pamphlet to which I have referred, which has been circulated here, that the money all went into the Arkansas State treasury and was for the benefit of the people of that State. I repeat that the State never received one cent of benefit from the money which was invested in these real-estate bonds.

Mr. GEORGE. Who sold the bonds?

Mr. BERRY. The State of Arkansas, or the bank sold them. They were issued to the bank.

Mr. GEORGE. Who got the money?

Mr. BERRY. The bank held the bonds and got the money and failed.

Mr. GEORGE. And never paid?

Mr. BERRY. And never paid.

I repeat, I do not state this for the purpose of showing that the State is not liable for these bonds, but I state it in order to show that she was the unfortunate victim of a bad law passed in the State of Arkansas in 1837.

One other fact, Mr. President, to which I desire to call the especial attention of the Senate. It is alleged in the communication to which I have already referred that, if this bill passes, the Smithsonian Institution and the Chickasaw National Fund will suffer. The Smithsonian Institution and the Chickasaws have not one cent in this fund. The Government of the United States long since paid all the money that they had invested in these bonds over to the Smithsonian Institution and to the Chickasaws. It is a question entirely between the Government of the United States and the State of Arkansas. The Smithsonian fund has been reimbursed; the Chickasaw fund has been provided for, and they are no longer parties in any way to this proposed settlement.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask a question right there; that is, whether the United States has actually paid the money to the Chickasaw fund for these bonds, or whether interest is still being paid?

Mr. BERRY. My opinion is that she has actually paid it and turned over the money, and interest is not being paid.

Mr. PLATT. And has reimbursed the fund?

Mr. BERRY. Absolutely. So that it is simply a question between the United States and the State of Arkansas. That is the foundation of the claim of the United States against the State. I repeat, so Senators may fully understand it, that they did purchase $631,000 of these bonds in the first part of the year 1838, I think, when they were issued.

The first objection which has been raised to this settlement and compromise, and one, I understand from a short conversation I had with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] on which he insists, is that in making the settlement the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury did not compute interest on the bonds after they had matured. That statement is true. The reason why interest was not calculated was because of the following opinion, given by the Attorney-General of the United States:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, February 14, 1895.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge your joint communication of the 12th instant, calling my attention to certain coupon 6 per cent interest-bearing bonds of the State of Arkansas, all dated January 1, 1838, and a portion of which matured October 26, 1861, and another portion January 1, 1868. A copy of one of said bonds is inclosed, and you inquire whether the State of Arkansas is liable for interest on said bonds from and after their maturity.

In my judgment the question must be answered unhesitatingly in the negative. The rule laid down in the case cited by you, United States vs. North Carolina (136 U. S., 211), has been explicitly declared to be the law of Arkansas by the highest court of that State; and I find nothing in the terms of the bonds themselves or in any legislation of Arkansas having any tendency to show that the State has consented to pay interest on the principal of these bonds after such principal became payable.

Respectfully, RICHARD OLNEY.

THE SECRETARIES OF THE TREASURY AND OF THE INTERIOR.

It was under that decision, Mr. President, that the officials of the Government acted, that the State by the law was not legally liable for the interest which had accrued after the maturity of the bonds. That is one of the objections which will be raised. I answer that by the opinion delivered by the Attorney-General and by the North Carolina case referred to in that opinion.

The amount found by the Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of the Interior to be due to the Government by the State of Arkansas, without counting interest on these bonds after maturity, was $1,611,803.61; and they also found that the State was entitled to credits for the sum of $1,451,231.61, leaving a balance due the Government from that State of $160,572. Another objection is made to some of the credits claimed and allowed to the State. In 1850 a law was passed by which the swamp and overflowed lands in all the States of this Union were donated to the respective States in which they were located for the purpose of the reclamation of such lands. Under that law thousands and millions of acres of land have been granted to a number of States. My State was largely swampy in character in its eastern portion, and a large part of those lands were so designated on the maps of the official survey.

I want to state here and now that, under the rulings made by the General Land Office, a State could either select under the official survey and take such lands as were designated as swamp by that survey, or they could take proof as to the swampy character of the lands, and make claim before the General Land Office. My State elected to take under the official survey, and thereby lost thousands of acres that other States obtained by reason of the fact that they had taken another method of making proof.

Subsequent to that act, in 1855 and 1857, Congress passed laws by which it was provided that wherever the Government had sold lands which turned out afterwards to be swamp lands, after the passage of the act of 1850, and sold them for money, the money should be refunded to the respective States in which the lands were located.

It furthermore provided that if the lands were located by scrip location or by military bounty land warrants, the State had a right to select other public lands without regard to their character, provided they were public lands, in lieu of the lands that had been located under the scrip location or the military bounty land warrant location.

A large part of the claim offset against this amount of money due the United States Government by my State comes from swamp lands to which we are entitled in lieu of lands subject to bounty land warrant and scrip location, and in lieu of the indemnity to which we were entitled by reason of the fact that the Government sold those swamp lands after the passage of the act of 1850 for cash. Under the acts of 1855 and 1857 the money belonged to the State of Arkansas.

I take occasion now, as I see the Senator from Iowa in his seat, to say that I was most profoundly astonished that the principal opposition to this bill should come from the State of Iowa, astonished for the reason that the character of claims we are making as an offset is the same from which that State has probably received more benefit than any other State in the Union.

Mr. President, those acts of 1855 and 1857, whether they were wise or unwise, provided that wherever the Government had sold land which was swamp at the time of the passage of the act of 1850 the money received should be paid to the State. Those acts furthermore provided that where the land was located by military bounty land warrants or scrip locations the State should select other land in lieu.

The State of Iowa, supposed to be a prairie State, high and dry, under these indemnity acts of 1855 and 1857 has drawn out of the United States Treasury in cash $540,173.07. She has certified indemnity lands to the amount of 341,632 acres, and that State yet claims an indemnity of 761,678 acres more. I repeat, that Iowa has already received under these acts of 1855 and 1857 more than $500,000 in cash; she has received indemnity land for more than 300,000 acres, and in addition she is claiming to-day indemnity, cash and land, for more than 700,000 acres.

Now, because we are to receive credit in this settlement for cash indemnity and for indemnity lands, the Senator from Iowa thinks that in the adjustment of this whole claim of ours that is unjust and unfair. If it be just that Iowa should receive this cash indemnity and these other indemnity lands, it seems to me that the rule of equity would apply with equal force to the State of Arkansas.

The main objection, as I understand, to the credit offered on behalf of the State of Arkansas is that which gives the State credit at $5 an acre for certain indemnity lands which she was entitled to select in lieu of military bounty warrant land and scrip land. I want to say in regard to that, that the experts in the Treasury Department took the testimony of 65 witnesses, three-fourths of them members of the legislature. They were as good men as we have in that State, and their testimony was that in the counties, while the average price was $1.25 an acre, yet in every county there was a large portion of the land which the State could take as indemnity which was worth from $5 to $10 an acre. This grew out of the fact that under this selection of lands we would be entitled to select coal lands if we could find such lands open to selection.

In addition to that, in the swamp lands in the Mississippi Valley there are thousands of acres of land which can not be homesteaded to-day because they are subject to overflow, upon which the timber now standing is worth more than $10 an acre, if there were any way of disposing of these lands except under the homestead law. I say, whether it be just or unjust, those 65 men have sworn that the average value of many of the lands outside of these one-dollar-and-twenty-five-cents-an-acre lands is more than $6.50 an acre instead of $5, the portion which we receive as a credit.

Those, I believe, are the two objections upon which these parties oppose the passage of the bill; but, Mr. President, those are not the real objections. I come now to speak of the only objection, the one but for which there never would have been any opposition in this or the other House to the passage of this bill. That objection refers to a clause made in the agreement by and between the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury, which I shall ask the Secretary to read for me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. PLATT. Before the agreement is read by the Secretary, will the Senator from Arkansas please explain a little more fully to the Senate why it is that the State of Arkansas should be credited with $5 an acre for those lands? They were lands to which she was entitled under some grant and did not get, as I understand, and it would be supposed she was entitled to other lands at the same price, that is, $1.25 an acre. I hope the Senator will explain that.

Mr. BERRY. In answer to the Senator from Connecticut, I will restate what I before stated. Under the indemnity acts of 1855 and 1857 it was provided that wherever land had been located by scrip locations or by bounty land warrants by any State, the State should have the right to select any of the other public lands in lieu of those. We have been trying here for twenty years to get an adjustment in the Interior Department to show how much indemnity lands we were entitled to, and I will state to the Senator why it has not yet been adjusted. I tried to explain to the Senator a while ago that when it was ascertained that we were entitled to indemnity lands we could select any character of land that might be known as public lands in lieu of those which had been otherwise taken.

Now, in order to get the matter settled, in order that this eternal controversy and contention may not go on for fifty years more, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury thought that it would be better for Arkansas to quitclaim all claims to indemnity money or to indemnity lands hereafter, and figuring upon the amount of a certain character of indemnity lands—not all of them, but a certain portion of them—they came to the conclusion that the State was entitled to receive credit for whatever lands she might select at the price they might be worth in case an adjustment could be made, and then take those. The testimony of these 65 witnesses, as I have said, was to the effect that $6.25 an acre is the average price of this land now. I ask the Secretary to read the clause of the agreement, which, as I say, contains all the real objections to the passage of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Nothing in this settlement and agreement is intended to or shall in any connection be held to prejudice the right of the State of Arkansas to assert and establish her title to any lands which were granted or confirmed to her by the said acts approved September 28, 1850; March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, in so far as the same is disputed by those claiming under any subsequent grant made or claimed to have been made, the scope and purpose of this settlement being hereby declared to be the adjustment of all disputes between the United States and the State of Arkansas, and to leave undisturbed incidental controversies between said State and other parties in which the United States is not beneficially interested.

Mr. BERRY. I want to state to the Senate that if the governor of Arkansas had consented to have omitted that provision from the bill, neither this Senate nor this Congress would ever have heard a solitary objection against it. The fight comes from the Iron Mountain Railroad Company in Arkansas, by which they seek to compel us to relinquish a claim that the State has against that company.

I want the especial attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]—inasmuch as he has asked me another question—to what I am now going to state. The provision of that agreement does not deprive that railroad company of any right which it has under the law; it puts it in no different condition, if the compromise shall be agreed to, from that in which it stands at present; it takes away from it no rights which it now has; and it gives to the State no greater right to secure money from it than she would have without the passage of the pending bill. But the Iron Mountain Railroad Company, seeing, as they thought, an opportunity to levy blackmail upon the State of Arkansas and compel the governor to agree to provisions which they knew he would never agree to, have come here with their agent, who has been here for weeks and for months lobbying with members of the Senate, to try to compel the State to relinquish a claim which she holds against that railroad company for 273,000 acres of land. That is the foundation of this fight. There is where the difficulty, and the whole difficulty, exists. I say to-day, if this bill took away any rights of the Iron Mountain Railroad Company—any character of rights—if it changed in any way the conditions which exist, then I would not blame them for their action or expect them to do otherwise than to make a contest against this bill; but they have said to us, "Unless you release us from your claim for 273,000 acres of swamp land, then you shall not pass a bill which would be beneficial, it may be, to the United States or to the State of Arkansas." That is the condition of affairs.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator explain how the Iron Mountain Railroad Company has a claim?

Mr. BERRY. I will. The swamp-land act passed in 1850. The courts of the country have decided that it was a grant in præsenti, and if the land was swampy in character the title to the land passed to the State at the time the grant was made. In 1853 the United States granted to the Iron Mountain Railroad Company alternate sections of land amounting to 273,000 acres, which were swampy, running through my State, and which belonged to the State at the time the selection was made, and the railroad company has selected and sold this 273,000 acres of swamp lands which belonged to the State. In making this settlement the governor put in a provision that this should not be held to prejudice the rights of the State either one way or the other, but should leave the Iron Mountain Railroad Company and the State to litigate the question in regard to the 273,000 acres of land.

Mr. GEORGE. Not to interfere on either side?

Mr. BERRY. To have no effect whatever. Now they come here and have the assurance to hold up the Senate and the Congress of the United States, and their agent has stated that "Unless you release your claim for these 273,000 acres of land, your bill shall not pass."

Mr. President, much as I should be glad to have this settlement made, much as I should like to see the old controversy ended, yet if that could be brought about, and even if it should put $500,000 more into the treasury of the State of Arkansas, I would not yield to the demand of this insolent railroad company, who seek by blackmail to interfere with legislation in the Congress of the United States. I regret that the company has taken that view. Its road passes through the entire length of my State from north to south, and it has branches running from Little Rock to Fort Smith, from Little Rock to Memphis, and from Noble to Helena. Each year that has gone by the people of that State have contributed thousands and millions of dollars to this great railroad system in the way of freight rates, carrying out all their products and bringing in nearly all the articles that are imported into the State. It has had every kindness from the people of Arkansas, and yet it has the assurance to come here and, without pretending that this legislation interferes with any right it has, to say to the committee of the House, as it has said again and again, unless you agree to this there can be no settlement.

I do not know who sent out these secret, anonymous pamphlets which have been printed and distributed to each Senator, but I do know that the attorney of that railroad in the closing days of the last Congress filed this objection in writing over his signature to this provision. I do know that Mr. Dean, who is the land agent of that road, has been here for weeks and months lobbying with members of the House and of the Senate against the bill. Therefore, while I do not know it, I have not the shadow of a doubt that it paid for the slanders that are contained in this anonymous report upon the people of a State from whom they have derived such immense benefit. I say I regret that that course has been taken, but I ask the Senate to deal with the question upon its merits. If it believes that it is best that the bill should be defeated, then let it vote it down on its merits; but I appeal to the Senate not to be held up by the great Missouri Pacific system, with all of its immense power in the Western portion of the Union.

Mr. President, much is said in this pamphlet in an attempt to cast obloquy upon and to abuse the people of the State of Arkansas for the failure to pay the indebtedness when it fell due. The first of those bonds fell due in October, 1861. At that time civil war existed throughout the entire length and breadth of this country, and the State of Arkansas had attached herself to another Government for the time being. She could not, under such circumstances, have been expected to have met that obligation. In 1868, when the other bonds fell due, it was absolutely impossible for the State to pay.

When the war closed, in 1865, our State, from the north to the south almost, presented a scene of universal desolation. Throughout the southern and eastern portions of the State, the great cotton-raising section, the slaves had been freed, the stock and farming implements were gone, and there was scarcely a large plantation that did not bear a mortgage—executed prior to the war. Throughout the northern part of the State in which I reside, along the borders of Missouri, war in all its most horrible phases had prevailed for four years. The whole section of country was absolutely desolate. The people had fled North and South. The only evidence almost throughout the entire country that civilization had ever existed were the grass-grown fields and the lone chimneys that marked places which had once been happy and peaceful homes.

That condition existed in 1865. Then came four years of reconstruction, and while it is true that we paid four and five dollars a hundred of taxation on what little property we had, yet the amount received was not sufficient to pay the expenses of the State government, to say nothing of paying those bonds. From the time the people again got into possession of the State until this day we have made an earnest effort to get a settlement of the matter, together with an adjustment to find out how much we owe, with a view to paying it. That has been the object and purpose of the entire delegation. We have had no other object. We do not desire to borrow any money.

Mr. President, we levy taxes sufficient to-day to meet all the expenses of the State government, and the taking off of this matter would not enable us to borrow money. We do not desire to borrow it, but we do desire that this old claim and these claims shall be finally and forever adjusted. The balance of the State debt is not large, and provision will be made and is made to meet it promptly. We would be glad to have this thing removed. The State has shown much progress. To-day she has a free-school system which is equal to any State in this Union when you consider her resources and the number of her population. We appropriate large sums of money each year for the State University, which now has more than 500 pupils. We appropriate large sums each year to pay for the normal school at Pine Bluff, which is for the education of colored teachers, and the State is making every effort within its power to do justice to every creditor.

Now, then, this settlement has been made. Two high officials of the Government, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury, say it is a just and fair compromise. If it is approved, we will pay $160,000, and that is the end of it. But I will ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] to tell the Senate, when he comes to speak, what advantage can come to the United States or to any individual if the compromise be rejected. The Senator knows very well that after these high officials have said we owe only $160,000 no legislature in any State in the Union could ever be brought to appropriate one dollar over and above that sum. The Senator knows that there is no way by which the claims can be settled except by compromise and adjustment. He knows that there is no power in the United States Government to enforce payment. Then I ask what benefit can come to any individual by a rejection of the settlement, allowing this old controversy and these old claims to stand. If it is rejected, that is the end of it. Our delegation here will have no hope ever to attempt another settlement. The State will never be induced to appropriate more than the sum of $160,000, which the Federal officials, after mature deliberation, say is a just and fair settlement.

Then I ask what reason there can be or what benefit can come if this settlement is rejected and the old controversy continues. I will admit, if it be of any value to the Senator from Iowa, that if the Government is to deal with one of the States of the Union as a usurer would deal with his debtor and count every dollar of interest, while the United States pays no interest herself, you can make us more largely in debt than the sum of $160,000. I will admit that if the conditions were different perhaps the amount paid for those lands might be a just subject of controversy; but upon the great question of the United States dealing with one of the States of the Union I hope and trust that they will deal in a more liberal spirit.

I should regret to believe that the Senator from Iowa or any other Senator could permit his sectional prejudices to weigh one ounce in the balance in the settlement of a great matter like this. I have said before that the Government has dealt most liberally with States of the Union, and that Iowa has drawn out of the Treasury more than $500,000 and is claiming a million acres of land.

In addition to that, but four years ago the State of Iowa came here by her senior Senator [Mr. ALLISON] in regard to the claims of the Des Moines River settlers, and no man can examine those claims without being forced to the conclusion that the blame rested with the State of Iowa and not with the United States. Yet the Senate in dealing with that State was liberal enough to appropriate in the sundry civil act $220,000 in money to pay the Des Moines settlers, and I am informed that the claim is not yet settled, and they are asking for more.

The Government has never dealt with individuals, and especially with States, as a usurer would deal with his debtor. Upon the contrary, two weeks ago, in the present Congress, the national House of Representatives passed a bill to give to the people of Oklahoma $8,000,000. That measure is now before the Senate committee, and if it passes at all it will be with an amendment applying the provisions of the act to the Indian reservations in South Dakota, in Idaho, in Montana, and various other Western States, and it will be more than $15,000,000 which the Government will give to those settlers if the bill becomes a law.

In view of all these facts, all I ask of the Senate is to treat my State as fairly as it treats others. We beg no favors that are not extended to others, but we ask that we be treated fairly and honestly. The settlement of this matter will do that which we believe will best promote the interests of the people of the United States at large and the people of Arkansas.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire merely to ask the Senator from Arkansas, who has made what I regard as a very lucid explanation of the case, a question on one point of it, so that I may understand it accurately. If I understood him aright, the Senator said that the Iron Mountain Railroad Company had located about 270,000 acres——

Mr. BERRY. Two hundred and seventy-three thousand acres.

Mr. GEORGE. Two hundred and seventy-three thousand acres of land which had been donated to the State of Arkansas under the swamp and overflowed act of 1850. Under that act, as I understand him to say, and as I understand it to be from my own recollection of the decision of the courts on the subject, the grant was made ipso facto by the passage of the act, and vested title in the State of Arkansas. There is no doubt about it so far.

I understand that the settlement which has been made between the State of Arkansas and the United States, now asked to be ratified, leaves the claim of the State of Arkansas to the 273,000 acres of land and the claim of the Iron Mountain Railroad to the same land exactly as they exist now, giving to neither any rights whatever except what they possess at this date. Is that a fact?

Mr. BERRY. That is absolutely correct, and it is so stated in the agreement. It does not affect their rights in one way or another. If the State can recover from them now she can recover after the passage of the bill. If she can not recover now she can not recover then.

Mr. GEORGE. So any opposition that may be offered by the Iron Mountain Railroad to the passage of the pending bill amounts simply to this: "Unless you surrender a claim to us"—speaking to the State of Arkansas—"in dispute between us, you shall not pass the bill."

Mr. BERRY. That is exactly correct.

Mr. PLATT. Let me ask one other question to see if I understand the matter. The State has a right to select these lands now under some indemnity act which has been passed. The State does not choose to do it. It prefers not to select the land, but to have the value of it credited to the State in this settlement and the value is fixed in the settlement. Is that the situation?

Mr. BERRY. That is not stating the matter as I understand it.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to get at the facts.

Mr. BERRY. The State has been trying for years to select the land. I wish to say furthermore that the swamp-land act did not make it necessary for the State to make the selection, but it required the Secretary of the Interior to make out the lists and furnish them to the State. The State has been trying for years to get those indemnity lands, but there has been no adjustment and settlement.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, in order that all matters should be settled, put this clause into the agreement. They suggested this compromise. They said it would be fair and just. They said, "We will give you so much credit for this and that." We claimed a credit for 906,000 acres of land, six hundred and seventy-odd thousand acres more than they gave us. Instead of giving us 906,000 acres, to which the State believes she was entitled, they gave us credit for 278,000 acres, about one-fourth of that amount. It was they who put this item into the agreement, and the State said, "In order that this may be finally settled, and that there shall be no hereafter in regard to it, we will give up our claim to the 906,000 acres; we will relinquish it to the Government of the United States. You can keep our 5 per cent money. We will relinquish all claims for indemnity in cash to which we are entitled under the law," while Iowa, as I said, has already drawn $500,000. "We will relinquish all that. You can keep our 5 per cent money, which every land State in this Union received and to which Arkansas was entitled. You can keep the indemnity to which we are entitled for school lands. You say that this is fair and just. We will take you at your word. We will sign the agreement," as our governor did, "and we will pay the $160,000 into the Treasury." We came to their terms and agreed, and I repeat that we did all they asked us to do, and I will state that it is all that ever can be done.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. President, I think the claim of the State of Arkansas and the claims between the State of Arkansas and the United States should be treated with great dignity. The claim of a State or a controversy between the Federal Government and a State should always be so treated. I have been at some pains to investigate the facts in this case. I wish to state them briefly to the Senate. After that, if the Senate is prepared to vote for the claim, all right. But it does not seem to me as a business man that this is a fair and just claim upon the part of the State of Arkansas against the Federal Government.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] has alluded to my own State, the State of Iowa, as having been a large beneficiary under the so-called swamp-land grant of 1850. He says that the State of Iowa is a high, rolling, prairie State. That is true, to a certain extent. Yet on the eastern and western slopes of the State, along the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, there are vast bodies of so-called and what really are or were swamp lands. The State was justly and honestly entitled to every dollar that the Federal Government paid it by way of indemnity for those lands.

In regard to the Des Moines Valley, I will state that it is a different case. Men whom I know personally went onto the Des Moines Valley land forty years ago. They entered those lands and had the deeds of the Government, signed by Abraham Lincoln, and by a construction of the supreme court of Iowa they were deprived of those lands. They came to Congress and we granted them $220,000. We should have granted them $700,000 to have been just. So much for that matter.

The Senator has said that there is a wheel within a wheel regarding this case—a land-grant case in his own State connected with the Iron Mountain Road. I do not know anything about that. In fact, I learned for the first time to-day that there is a land-grant road in his own State. That has nothing to do with this question. The questions that underlie this matter are simply questions of fact. It is a common principle of law that men who come into court should come with clean hands, and I do not think, with all due deference to the Senator from Arkansas, that Arkansas comes into court in that condition.

What are the facts? This proposed amendment was authorized by an act passed two years ago empowering the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior and the governor of Arkansas to do certain things. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, respectively, sent a clerk from his Department who went out to the State of Arkansas and took sixty odd affidavits. And what do those affidavits amount to? They simply show the value of certain lands which the Government would be entitled to reimburse the State of Arkansas for at the rate of $1.25. Those affidavits to which the Senator alludes so pathetically simply show that the lands are worth to-day five or six dollars an acre. I do not doubt it. It is a fact, undoubtedly. But it has no bearing, it strikes me, on this case.

Arkansas was admitted a State in the Union under act of Congress approved June 23, 1836. (5 U. S. Stats., 58.)

Under said act said State was granted by Congress as follows, to wit:

1. Section 16 in every township therein, or lands in lieu thereof and equivalent in area thereto, equal to 836,460 acres. (See page 70, Senate Report No. 226, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.)

2. Twelve salt springs with 6 sections of land to each, or 72 sections (with certain provisos), equal to 46,080 acres.

3. Five per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of all lands, claimed by said State to be 5 per cent of $19,811,641.43, equal to $990,582.07. (See pages 69, 70 of said Senate Report No. 226.)

4. Five sections of land for completing public buildings in addition to the 10 sections granted her as a Territory by act of March 2, 1831 (4 U. S. Stats., 473), and by act of July 4, 1832 (4 U. S. Stats., 563), or 15 sections of land, equal to 9,600 acres.

5. Two townships of land for a seminary, confirming in that regard the act of March 2, 1827 (4 U. S. Stats., 235), or 72 sections, equal to 46,080 acres.

6. Said State when a Territory having been granted for courthouse and jail purposes, under the act of June 15, 1832 (4 U. S. Stats., 531), equal to 1,000 acres.

7. On the same day (June 23, 1836) when the act to admit Arkansas was approved there was also approved another act, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money" (5 U. S. Stats., 52), under section 13 of which act Arkansas was paid her proportionate share of the $28,101,644.91 deposited with the several States in the Union on January 1, 1837, to wit, the sum of $286,-751.49.

The history of that allotment to Arkansas was that under the tariff of 1824 there had grown to be a large surplus in the Treasury of the United States, and the Congress at that time, thinking it was best, loaned—or perhaps it might be better to say donated, for I believe very little of it has ever been returned—this large sum of which the share of Arkansas was $286,000 in round numbers.

8. Under the act approved September 4, 1841 (5 U. S. Stats., 453), Arkansas was granted for internal improvement purposes 500,000 acres.

9. Under the act approved September 4, 1841 (5 U. S. Stats., 453), in addition to the 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands theretofore granted her, Arkansas was granted an additional 10 per cent thereof.

10. By the act of September 28, 1850 (9 U. S. Stats., 519), Arkansas was granted all the lands in said State which on that date "were swamp and overflowed, and thereby made unfit for cultivation," and the State authorities of that State have already selected lands alleged by them to be of that class, and now recorded in the General Land Office, an area equal to 8,656,372.39 acres. (See page 300, Report G. L. O., 1895.)

One-fourth, practically, Mr. President, of the whole area of Arkansas. The whole area of her lands amounts to 33,948,000 acres.

11. Said State was entitled to receive indemnity lands in certain cases under the act of March 3, 1855 (10 U. S. Stats., 634), an act entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers and locaters of swamp and overflowed lands."

12. Said State was entitled to receive additional indemnity lands under the act of March 3, 1857 (11 U. S. Stats., 251), an act entitled "An act to confirm to the several States the swamp and overflowed lands under the act of September 28, 1850, and act of March 2, 1849."

13. Said State became entitled to credit for 5 per cent on lands embraced in any Indian reservations in said State under the act of March 3, 1857 (11 U. S. Stats., 200), an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the State of Mississippi and other States."

14. Said State became entitled to credit for 5 per cent on any lands in that State located by Indian scrip under the decision of the Secretary of the Interior (Hon. Jacob Thompson) of March 20, 1858, in construing the meaning and intention of the aforesaid act of March 3, 1857 (11 U. S. Stats., 200), an act entitled "An act to settle certain accounts between the State of Mississippi and other States." (See pages 3 and 4 of said Senate Report No. 226.)

15. Said State received a grant of 150,000 acres of land in the form of 150,000 acres of agricultural college scrip under the act of December 13, 1872 (17 U. S. Stats., 397), which scrip was sold by said State and located on the public lands in other public-land States, subject to private entry therein, at $1.25 per acre.

At the dates of all these acts of Congress continuously to March 1, 1896, the minimum price of the public lands in Arkansas not mineral, when a lesser price had not been established by law, was fixed by Congress at $1.25 per acre, except the alternate reserved sections inside of the geographical lateral limits of lands granted for railroad purposes, the price for which was fixed at the double minimum per acre.

It is alleged by the State of Arkansas substantially that officers of the Executive Departments of the United States Government, when executing these several grants and acts of Congress in her case, have in some way or other (not very clearly defined or fully specified or made as yet intelligible to Congress) so administered the same as, in the opinion of some persons, not to have done that State full justice, and hence contentions have arisen in the Executive Departments of the United States which constitute the alleged claims or the basis of the alleged claims of said State against the United States, to investigate, compromise, and settle which were the objects sought to be secured by the enactment of the act of Congress approved August 14, 1894, an act entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas."

THE CLAIM OF THE UNITED STATES AGAINST THE STATE OF ARKANSAS.

It is everywhere admitted and nowhere denied that on January 1, 1838, the State of Arkansas borrowed from the "Smithsonian trust fund" the sum of $388,000 from the United States as the trustee of said fund, which was held in trust by the United States, to whom it was generously donated on condition that the principal so donated and the interest earned by a safe and judicious investment of said principal should be sacredly dedicated "to the diffusion of knowledge among mankind."

To secure the full payment of said principal and the prompt payment of said interest when due of said loan from said "Smithsonian trust fund" so then held in trust by the United States for said purpose, the State of Arkansas deposited with the United States 538 of her $1,000 State 6 per cent coupon bonds, by her issued under the act of her legislature, an act entitled "An act to establish the Real Estate Bank of the State of Arkansas," approved October 26, 1836, and the act amendatory thereof, entitled "An act to increase the rate of interest on the bonds of the State issued to the Real Estate Bank of the State of Arkansas," approved December 19, 1837. (State Statutes of Arkansas, 1837, page 51.) Said bonds bore date January 1, 1838, and said coupons were payable on January and July 1 of each year.

Five hundred of said State $1,000 bonds, it is alleged, matured on October 26, 1861, and the remaining 38 thereof, it is alleged, matured on January 1, 1868, and it is also everywhere admitted and can not be anywhere successfully denied that none of said bonds, nor any portion of any of said coupons representing interest so earned by any of said bonds, were ever paid by said State, either on said dates or on any other dates, but, on the contrary, that all of same, principal and interest, remain wholly unpaid by said State up to this date.

It is true that between July 1, 1836, and December 31, 1845, said State earn d the sum of $70,047.78 from the 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands made therein by the United States; but between January 1, 1838, and December 31, 1845, the amount of interest due by said State on said $538,000 at 6 per cent per annum aggregated the sum of $298,240, or more than four times the amount of said earnings from the 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in said State, the payment of which 5 per cent earnings was not made to said State, but was withheld by the United States and applied to reduce pro tanto the amount of said unpaid interest due on said unpaid debt, as authorized to be done under the joint resolution of Congress of March 3, 1845 (5 U. S. Stats., 801), which is as follows, to wit:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever any State shall have been or may be in default for the payment of interest or principal on investments in its stocks or bonds held by the United States in trust, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retain the whole, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the percentage to which said State may be entitled of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within its limits, and apply the same to the payment of said interest or principal or to the reimbursement of any sums of money expended by the United States for that purpose.

2. In addition thereto the State of Arkansas, on January 1, 1849, borrowed the further sum of $3,000 from the "Chickasaw Indian orphan fund," a fund then held in trust by the United States for the benefit of the orphans of said Indians; and to secure the full payment of said principal and the prompt payment of interest due thereon at maturity said State deposited three of her State $1,000 5 per cent registered bonds, which matured on January 1, 1887, but no one of said bonds and no portion of any interest earned by either thereof were ever paid by said State on said date or on any other date, but all of the same, principal and interest, remain wholly unpaid up to this date.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question for information? In this account the State of Arkansas is charged with the bonds which were issued on account of the loan from the Smithsonian fund, $500,000, and to interest on the bonds, but apparently the interest ceases at the maturity of the bonds.

Mr. GEAR. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. PLATT. In this proposed settlement is interest charged on the bonds from the time they matured until the present?

Mr. GEAR. No; it is not. I shall come to that and state it in a moment.

3. Again, said State on January 1, 1838, borrowed the further sum of $90,000 from the "Chickasaw Indian national trust fund," a fund then held in trust by the United States for the benefit of said Indians. To secure the full payment of the principal and the prompt payment of the interest earned thereon, said State deposited with the United States 90 of her $1,000 State bonds, and which bonds matured on October 26, 1861: but no part of the principal and no part of any of the interest due on any of said bonds was ever paid by said State on that date or on any other date.

Prior to December 13, 1872, the State of Arkansas was a petitioner to the United States for a grant of 150,000 acres of public land under the agricultural college act of July 2, 1862 (12 U. S. Stats., 130), and on December 13, 1872 (17 U. S. Stats., 397), Congress passed an act authorizing an issue to her of 150,000 acres of agricultural college scrip, but with this proviso, to wit:

That no scrip as aforesaid shall be delivered to the authorities of the State of Arkansas until said State shall have made some satisfactory arrangement by which the bonds of said State, principal and interest, now held by the United States as Indian trust funds shall be funded in new bonds authorized to be issued by said State for this purpose.

About or soon after this date said debt of $90,000, with its earned and unpaid interest, aggregated, it is alleged, about the sum of $252,000, more or less. The said State accepted said act of Congress of December 13, 1872, with all its provisions and conditions, and liquidated its said accumulated debt of $90,000, which, with interest, had grown to a sum alleged to be $252,000, and did liquidate the same in the way that debts are sometimes liquidated, by taking up said $90,000 worth of old 6 per cent bonds and certain accumulated unpaid interest due thereon by issuing new 6 per cent coupon bonds in said equal sum of $252,000, and thereafter deposited the same with the United States, to wit, 252 of her $1,000 State 6 per cent coupon bonds of such new issue, bearing interest from January 1, 1874, to secure said debt in that amount of $252,000 then due by her to said "Chickasaw Indian national trust fund," said coupons being payable semiannually.

The statement of that debt puts me in mind of Dickens's character, Micawber, who was always "waiting for something to turn up." He always paid the debts that he owed with a note. So with Arkansas. She paid this original $90,000 debt, which amounted to $250,000 with accrued interest, with a new note, and considered the whole thing adjusted and settled. That is the kind of a settlement that they are here to make.

Said new bonds are alleged to mature on January 1, 1900: but, like said similar issue of said similar obligations to secure the full payment of said original principal and prompt payment of the interest due thereon, no portion of said interest has ever been paid by said State up to this date, except by the withholding in driblets said 5 per cent earnings, and thereby reducing pro tanto said unpaid accumulated interest debt.

This, then, constitutes substantially the claim of the United States against the State of Arkansas.

On the one hand, the claim so made by the United States is fixed in character, and though it may be many years old, yet it is immutable by time, because it is easily determinate, exactly determinable in amount, and concerning which, in equity, there should not be, and in conscience there can not be, any doubt or contention.

The amount of the principal due the United States by the State of Arkansas is mutually and universally admitted, not denied; and the amount of interest now due by said State on said principal has been fixed by said State itself and is easily computed, because of the recitals on the face of her own bonds, copy of No. 1 of which is as follows.

I will publish the bond and not read it. I will simply say that it is a facsimile copy of the bond, in English and French, issued by the State of Arkansas. I will merely say that these bonds were negotiated through the late W. W. Corcoran, and were paid for by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that is the way they became the property of the United States; that is, they were paid for by taking funds from the Smithsonian Institution which the United States held in trust and put into these bonds for security:

ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS. ARKANSAS STATE BOND.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

STATE OF ARKANSAS.

No. 1. A.

£ stg. 225. Fcs. 5,000.

REAL ESTATE BANK OF THE STATE OF ARKANSAS.

SIX PER CENT STOCK.

Under an act of the general assembly of the State of Arkansas entitled "An act to establish the Real Estate Bank of the State of Arkansas," approved October 26, 1836.

And an act supplementary thereto entitled "An act to increase the rate of interest on the bonds of the State, issued to the Real Estate Bank of the State of Arkansas," approved 19th December, 1837.

Know all men by these presents, that the State of Arkansas acknowledges to be indebted to the Real Estate Bank of the State of Arkansas in the sum of $1,000, which sum the said State of Arkansas promises to pay in current money of the United States, to the order of the president, directors, and company of said bank, on the 26th day of October, 1861, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable half yearly, at the place named in the indorsement hereto, on the 1st day of January and July of each year, until the payment of said principal.

In testimony whereof the governor of the State of Arkansas has signed and the treasurer of the State has countersigned these presents, and caused the seal of the State to be fixed thereto at Little Rock this 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1838.

I hereby assign the within bond to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, for the time being, or his order, under the provisions of the act of Congress of 7th July, 1838. (See 5 U. S. Stats., 267-465.)

W. W. CORCORAN.

CLAIMS OF THE STATE OF ARKANSAS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

On the other hand, the claims of the State of Arkansas against the United States have heretofore substantially consisted largely of disputed facts and controverted questions of law, growing out of the official administration and construction in the Interior Department of the laws of Congress relating to certain of the aforesaid Congressional grants, etc., which construction, so applied to Arkansas, has also been ever made equally applicable by that Department to all the other public-land States, under the same or similar laws and grants, to none of which has Congress ever made Arkansas an exception.

Before any of said claims of said State against the United States could possibly be fully understood by Congress they should be specifically and exactly stated by those having a thorough and full knowledge of and mature experience in all matters relating or germane thereto, and be reduced to a fixed money value, if they are to be accepted as proper set-offs or counterclaims to the money debt now due the United States by the State of Arkansas. No one, surely, will attempt to deny that this should be done to enable Congress, when sitting as a tribunal in equity in a controversy between litigants so dignified as the United States and one of the States of the Union, to intelligently and duly investigate and maturely consider the same, in order that such controversy may be finally determined and adjudicated upon principles of mutual fairness, to the end that said controversy and all contention in regard thereto should finally terminate.

It was looking to secure an end not of some but of all these contentions that seemingly justified the enactment of the act of August 4, 1894 (28 U. S. Stats., 299), entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas"; Congress in said act having reserved to itself, however, the right and duty to revise all acts had or done thereunder.

The question therefore to be considered is, Has said act of August 4, 1894, as reported to Congress on February 23, 1895, been carefully, clearly, exhaustively, and equitably executed in the equal and mutual interest of the United States and of that State?

Congress must ever remember that the Government of the United States stands the guardian and trustee, under sacred obligation, to guard and protect the trusts reposed in it, not only for the benefit of the Indians and their orphan children, the nation's wards at home, but in very honor, honesty, and gratitude occupy no less a relation to that generous donor—James Smithson—who, though speaking our language, yet never put foot on American soil, and who, though ever loyal to the land over which the flag of England floats, yet so loved his fellow-men and was so appreciative of the honest purposes and high destiny of our people that he bequeathed to our Government, in trust, the residue of his then large estate, to be honestly expended by us in diffusing knowledge among mankind, and in honor of whose name and high intentions the Smithsonian Institution now stands a monument beneath the very shadow of these legislative halls.

But said monument thus erected was not erected with Smithson's funds, because prior to its erection said funds had been intrusted to the safe and sacred keeping and secure protection of the State of Arkansas, and as to how sacredly and safely said trust funds have been kept, and as to how securely they have been protected by that State, let the records presented to the Senate be the unimpeachable witnesses.

The original attitude of the United States as a trustee only of said "Smithson fund" (5 U. S. Stats., 64, 267, 465) has been radically changed, a change enforced by honor and honesty, so that the United States have been compelled, out of their own Treasury, to make good the default of the State of Arkansas. I wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury asking him when and how this money was reimbursed by Congress to the Smithsonian Institution. Much to my surprise, I was advised that there was no entry to be found upon the books of the Treasury as to when and how this money was reimbursed to the Smithsonian. A letter, however, from the Smithsonian Institution states that by a certain act of Congress, which I have not time to read or refer to, the money was reimbursed, as it should have been, by the United States, the United States being the custodian of that fund, and out of that money the present Smithsonian Institution was created, and out of the annual appropriation, which amounts to 6 per cent on the land originally granted by James Smithson, that institution is carried on and cared for by the Government, an institution which is the admiration not only of Congress but of the people of the whole United States, a people who will ever bear in mind a grateful recollection of the donor of that great fund.

In order, therefore, that Congress might be fully, correctly, and officially advised as to the kind, nature, and amount of the respective claims of the United States and of the State of Arkansas, and the date when and manner in which the same arose, so as to be enabled to compromise and settle the same, Congress on August 14, 1894, passed the act entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas." (28 U. S. Stats., 229.)

On February 23, 1895, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior submitted to the Senate a report of their action had thereon, which was printed as Senate Executive Document No. 91, Fifty-third Congress, third session. Action in the Senate and House then and now seems to have been limited to making reports thereon in the Senate and House.

House Report No. 1959, Fifty-third Congress, third session, seeming to contain nearly all the matters theretofore officially stated in reference to said act of August 14, 1894, a copy thereof will be submitted as a part of my remarks.

From this report it is alleged and is made to appear that the State of Arkansas is indebted to the United States only in the sum of $1,611,803.61, appearing more in detail thus:

ACCOUNT.

The State of Arkansas in account with the United States on account of bonds issued by the State, with the interest accrued thereon, the claims of the State arising under the public-land laws of the United States, and the claim of the State for care of military prisoners, adjusted to January 1, 1895.

(1) To State of Arkansas 6 per cent bonds (Nos. 1 to 500, inclusive), $1,000 each, issued January 1, 1838, and matured October 26, 1861, to secure a loan from the Smithsonian fund, held in trust by the United States, which bonds were subsequently acquired by the United States in their own right	$500,000.00
(2) To interest on 366 of these bonds (Nos. 135-500), at 6 per cent per annum, from July 1, 1842, to October 26, 1861 (nineteen years nine months and twenty-five days)	425,235.00
(3) To interest on 133 of these bonds (1 to 133), at 6 per cent per annum, from July 1, 1860, to October 26, 1861 (one year three months and twenty-five days)	10,529.17
(4) To interest on 1 of these bonds (No. 134) at 6 per cent per annum, from July 1, 1852, to October 26, 1861 (nine years three months and twenty-five days), less $19.72, paid on 1 coupon in 1860	539.44
(5) To state of Arkansas bonds (6 per cent coupons), of $1,000 each, 38 in number (Nos. 282-294, 359-373, 401-410), issued January 1, 1838, to secure a loan from the Smithsonian fund, which bonds matured January 1, 1868, and now belong to the United States	38,000.00
(6) To interest thereon, at 6 per cent per annum, from January 1, 1842, to January 1, 1868 (twenty-six years)	59,280.00
(7) To 3, $1,000 each, State of Arkansas 5 per cent registered bonds, acquired for the Chickasaw orphan fund by investing the proceeds arising from the sale of two quarter sections of land in the case of Hiram R. Pitchlyn, pursuant to article 8 of treaty stipulations with the Chickasaw Indians, which bonds now belong to the United States	3,000.00
(8) To interest on these bonds, at 5 per cent per annum, from January 1, 1849, to date of maturity, January 1, 1887 (thirty-eight years)	5,700.00

(9) To 252 new 6 per cent coupon bonds of $1,000 each, issued by that State under the adjustment of the Chickasaw national fund on January 1, 1874, in which it was agreed that the 90, $1,000 each, 6 per cent coupon bonds of that State, originally purchased out of that fund, together with the accrued and unpaid interest thereon, should be funded after crediting the State with $7,677.80 on account of care of military prisoners, and these 252 new 6 per cent coupon bonds issued in payment of old bonds and interest	$252,000.00
(10) To accrued and unpaid interest on these bonds from date of issue, January 1, 1874, to date of this settlement, January 1, 1895, at 6 per cent per annum, being $252,000, at 6 per cent, for twenty-one years	317,520.00
Total amount of bonds and interest	1,611,803.61

It is submitted, however, that said sum of $1,611,803.61 is too small by $1,104,746.67, because the more exact sum should be and is $2,716,550.28, as recited in a table compiled in the Treasury Department accompanying a letter from the Secretary of January 30, 1896, as follows, to wit:

SIR: In compliance with your request of the 25th instant, asking to be furnished with a statement showing the amount that would be due the United States from Arkansas, if all credits due the State be disregarded, and interest on the bonds be computed to January 1, 1896, I have the honor to transmit herewith such a statement, showing in aggregate $2,716,550.28.

Respectfully, yours,

E. S. HAMLIN, Acting Secretary.

HON. GEORGE D. MEIKLEJOHN,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

A statement showing the amount of bonds and interest accrued thereon to January 1, 1896, held by the United States against the State of Arkansas, disregarding all credits to which said State may be entitled on any account:

1. State of Arkansas 6 per cent bonds (Nos. 1 to 500) of $1,000 each, issued January 1, 1838, and matured October 26, 1861, to secure a loan from the Smithsonian fund, held in trust by the United States, which bonds were subsequently acquired and are now held by the United States in their own right	$500,000.00
2. Interest on 366 of these bonds (Nos. 135-500) at 6 per cent per annum, from July 1, 1842, to January 1, 1896	1,174,860.00
3. Interest on 133 of these bonds (Nos. 1-133) at 6 per cent per annum, from July 1, 1852, to January 1, 1896	283,290.00
4. Interest on 1 of these bonds (No. 134) at 6 per cent per annum, from July 1, 1852, to January 1, 1896, less $19.72	2,590.28
5. Thirty-three State of Arkansas 6 per cent coupon bonds (Nos. 282-294, 359-373, 401-410) of $1,000 each, issued January 1, 1838, to secure a loan from the Smithsonian fund, which bonds matured January 1, 1868, and now belong to the United States in their own right	33,000.00
6. Interest thereon from January 1, 1842, to January 1, 1896, at 6 per cent per annum	123,120.00
7. Three State of Arkansas 5 per cent registered bonds of $1,000 each, acquired for the Chickasaw orphan fund, and matured January 1, 1887, but now belonging to the United States	3,000.00
8. Interest thereon from January 1, 1849, to January 1, 1896	7,050.00
9. Two hundred and fifty-two new State of Arkansas 6 per cent coupon bonds of $1,000 each, issued under the adjustment of 1874, growing out of the $90,000 originally borrowed from the Chickasaw national fund, which bonds belong to the United States	252,000.00
10. Interest thereon at 6 per cent per annum from January 1, 1874, to January 1, 1896	332,674.00
Total bonds and interest	2,716,550.28

Said lesser sum of $1,611,803.61 relies for exactness of computation upon an opinion of the United States Attorney-General of February 14, 1895, wherein the Attorney-General relied upon the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the North Carolina case (136 U. S. Reports, 211), as follows, to wit:

[A. G., 2676-1895.]

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., February 14, 1895.

The honorable the Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Interior.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge your joint communication of the 12th instant, calling my attention to certain coupon 6 per cent interest-bearing bonds of the State of Arkansas, all dated January 1, 1838, and a portion of which matured October 26, 1861, and another portion January 1, 1868. A copy of one of said bonds is inclosed, and you inquire whether the State of Arkansas is liable for interest on said bonds from and after their maturity.

In my judgment, the question must be answered unhesitatingly in the negative. The rule laid down in the case cited by you (United States vs. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 211) has been explicitly declared to be the law of Arkansas by the highest court of that State.

And I find nothing in the terms of the bonds themselves or in any legislation of Arkansas having any tendency to show that the State has consented to pay interest on the principal of these bonds after such principal became payable.

Respectfully,

RICHARD OLNEY,
Attorney-General.

It will be noted that this opinion is based upon the case of the United States vs. North Carolina (136 U. S., 211). In this case Chief Justice Grey says:

From the general principle that an obligation of the State to pay interest, whether as interest or as damages, on any debt overdue, can not arise except by the consent and contract of the State, manifested by statute, or in a form authorized by statute, it appears to us to follow as a necessary consequence that no authority to the officers of the State to bind it by such an obligation can be implied from the act of 1852, requiring the certificates or bonds issued under it to be made payable at a day named in them, and to have coupons of interest attached to them, and making no mention whatever of interest after the date at which the principal is payable.

In the light of the provisions of this statute, the agreement in the bonds sued on, that the principal sum shall be "redeemable in good and lawful money" at the place and day therein designated, must be deemed equivalent to an agreement that they shall be payable on that day, and if the further provision by which the interest is payable half-yearly "from the date of this bond and until the principal be paid, on surrendering the proper coupons hereto annexed," could, upon the face of the bonds, and without regard to the law under which they were issued, be construed to include interest after the date at which the principal is payable, and for which interest there were no coupons to be surrendered, it can not be allowed such an effect, because the State of North Carolina has never authorized its officers to incur any such obligations in its behalf.

There was nothing in the statute of North Carolina under which the bonds in question in this case were executed and delivered providing for the payment of interest on the bonds until they were paid, and, as the court holds, the State can not be made liable to pay interest on an overdue debt, except through its consent or on a contract duly authorized by legislative enactment.

While the bonds executed and delivered by the governor of the State of North Carolina and her treasurer contained a provision—

With interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable half yearly at the said bank on the 1st days of January and July each year, from the date of this bond and until the principal be paid, on surrendering the proper coupons hereto annexed—

The court holds that there was no authority in the statutes under which the bonds were issued for the governor of the State and the treasurer to bind the State to pay interest until the principal was paid.

Mr. President, the bonds of the State of Arkansas involved in this settlement were issued under an act of the State of Arkansas entitled "An act to establish the Real Estate Bank of the State of Arkansas," approved October 26, 1836, and the act amendatory, entitled "An act to increase the rate of interest on the bonds of the State issued to the Real Estate Bank of the State of Arkansas," approved December 19, 1837, by the provisions of which the faith and credit of the State is not only pledged to the payment of the bonds and interest, but the legislature authorized in said act the governor and treasurer of the State to issue bonds in the sum of $2,000,000, a form of which bond is included in the statute, in which form provision is made for payment of interest on said bonds until the payment of the principal.

The following is a copy of the form to be used in the execution and delivery of said bonds, as found in section 10 of the act of October 26, 1836:

One thousand dollars.

Know all men by these presents, that the State of Arkansas acknowledges to be indebted to the Real Estate Bank of the State of Arkansas in the sum of $1,000, which sum the said State of Arkansas promises to pay in current money of the United States, to the order of the president, directors, and company of said bank, on the ——, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, payable half yearly at the place named in the indorsement hereto on the 1st day of —— and —— of each year until the payment of said principal.

In testimony whereof the governor of the State of Arkansas has signed and the treasurer of the State has countersigned these presents, and caused the seal of the State to be affixed thereto, at Little Rock, this —— day of ——, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ——.

It will be seen from this that the case of the United States vs. North Carolina (136 U. S., 211) is not applicable to the bonds of the State of Arkansas included in the settlement between the State of Arkansas and the United States, as made by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury, representing the Government, and Hon. James P. Clark, governor of the State of Arkansas, representing the State of Arkansas, and that the amount due the Government on said bonds, including interest to January 1, 1896, is $2,716,550.28, instead of $1,611,803.61, as found by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior.

It is impossible for anyone to now state, and it seems to be almost impossible for anyone to find out as yet, just what the exact money value of all the claims of the State of Arkansas against the United States really is, but the items with which she is credited, so as to offset said $1,611,803.61, are recited in said House Report 1959 as follows, to wit:

ACCOUNT.

The State of Arkansas in account with the United States on account of bonds issued by the State, with the interest accrued thereon, the claims of the State arising under the public-land laws of the United States, and the claim of the State for care of military prisoners, adjusted to January 1, 1895.

By amounts accrued to the credit of the State under section 3 of the act of June 23, 1836 (5 Stat. U. S., 58), from July 1, 1836, to January 1, 1895, withheld by the United States (for which no interest coupons on the bonds held against the State have been surrendered), now applied as follows (Exhibit A):
On bonds acquired through the Smithsonian fund	$12,822.59
On bonds acquired through the Chickasaw national fund	40,493.61
On bonds acquired through the Chickasaw orphan fund	1,800.00
(1) By 125,000 acres of land (Exhibit 3) claimed as swamp land in place, filed under act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. U. S., 519), reclaimed to the United States by this settlement, at $1.25 per acre	156,250.00
(2) By 90,400 acres of land (Exhibit 4) selected and filed as a basis of land indemnity, under acts of March 2, 1855 (10 Stat. U. S., 634), and March 3, 1857 (supra), reclaimed to the United States by this settlement, at $5 per acre	452,000.00
(3) By 118,760 acres of land (Exhibit 4) claimed as a basis of cash indemnity, under the act of March 3, 1857 (supra), reclaimed to the United States by this settlement, at $1.25 per acre	148,450.00
(4) By 63,920 acres of land (Exhibit 7), claimed to be swamp under the indemnity acts above named, which have been listed and filed by the State and disposed of by the United States subsequent to the passage of said indemnity acts; now reclaimed to the United States by this settlement at $1.25 per acre	79,900.00

(5) By 30,000 acres of land (Exhibit 9) listed by the agent of the State, Thomas G. Riley, as indemnity school lands, and sent to the governor of the State for amendment to comply with certain departmental regulations as to certificates of nonmineral character and not yet adjusted. These selections are believed to be a valid claim, and the lands are reclaimed to the United States by this settlement at $5 per acre	$150,000.00
(6) By 1,792.85 acres of indemnity school land (Exhibit 8, Table 3), a list of which has been filed and officially reported as "apparently valid," which are reclaimed by this settlement at $5 per acre	8,964.25
(7) By 160 acres of land (Exhibit 8, Table 3), being the residue of the grant under act of June 15, 1832 (4 Stat. U. S., 531), entitled "Court-house and jail grant"; reclaimed by this settlement at $5 per acre	800.00
(8) By 110.97 acres of land (Exhibit 8, Table 3), granted under act of September 4, 1841 (5 Stat. U. S., 453), for internal improvements; reclaimed by this settlement at $5 per acre	554.85
(9) By 6,223.31 acres of seminary lands (Exhibit 8, Table 3), due the State under section 5, act June 23, 1836; reclaimed by this settlement at $5 per acre	31,116.65
(10) By 16.01 acres of land (Exhibit 8, Table 3) granted under the act of March 2, 1831 (4 Stat. U. S., 473), for the erection of public building at the seat of government; reclaimed at $5 per acre	80.05
(11) By 51.13 acres of land (Exhibit 8, Table 3) granted under section 4, act of June 30, 1836, being the residue of five sections granted under that act for the completion of public buildings; reclaimed at $5 per acre	255.65
(12) By 3,840 acres of salt-spring land (Exhibit 8, Table 3), being six sections not yet certified to the State under section 2, act of June 23, 1836; reclaimed to the United States by this settlement at $5 per acre	19,200.00
(13) By 278,835.248 acres of land, being about one-fourth of 906,260 acres, claimed as swamp land in place and as a basis of land and cash indemnity, under acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, at $1.25 per acre, in satisfaction of the whole claim	348,544.06
(14) Leaving 160 of the 252 new 6 per cent coupon bonds of $1,000 each to be protected by the State and redeemed at maturity, January 1, 1900	160,000.00
(15) Leaving a balance, which the State is to pay in cash within thirty days, of	572.00
Total credits, bonds, and cash	1,611,803.61

As I said before, I do not know of any reason why the State of Arkansas should be paid $5 an acre for a claim which never has been allowed to any State by this Government that I am aware of, and more than the other States have been paid under the same conditions, that is, $1.25 an acre.

But these enumerated items of specific claims do not include all the items of all the alleged claims of said State heretofore alleged to exist against the United States, but, such as said enumerated items are, as used as setoffs to cancel said debt even in the sum of $1,611,803.61, it seems to me that the Senate is utterly without proper and full official information as to their merits, or whether they actually existed on February 23, 1895, or even now exist.

The Senate by resolution (adopted March 2, 1896) called upon the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior to furnish certain specific information, reply to which was made Monday, March 9, 1896, which I have not as yet examined, so as to enable me to know whether or not said reply furnishes data sufficient to enable the Senate to act intelligently in this matter, and until the Senate shall have fully acquainted itself with all the matters in said reply pertinent hereto I can not now clearly see how it can properly reach any final conclusion in these premises.

Mr. FRYE (at 2 o'clock p. m.). I ask the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], and I desire the attention of the Chair too. This bill was made the unfinished business by unanimous consent, and on Friday it was removed from its character of unfinished business by being placed in the morning hour.

Mr. BERRY. No; if the Senator will pardon me, nothing was done on Friday, the last day's session. I simply gave a notice, and this morning, instead of making a motion, I asked unanimous consent that we might take up the unfinished business.

Mr. FRYE. Has the Senator from Arkansas any objection that the special order, which was made an order some time before the pending bill, shall take the place of the unfinished business and that the special order then be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. BERRY. I do not want the bill to lose its place as the unfinished business until it is concluded. After that I shall have no objection. I want it to retain its place. I am certain that we can get through with it to-day, but I do not want it to lose its place as the unfinished business. I do not think that would be right. I do not think the Senator from Maine would want to displace it as the unfinished business now that it is being disposed of.

Mr. GEAR. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I shall probably be through in about thirty-five minutes, and I shall then be ready for a vote. We can reach a vote to-day upon the bill, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BERRY. I think we shall get through with the bill this evening, but of course it will remain as the unfinished business until it is disposed of. I have worked so long to get its consideration by the Senate that I trust the Senator from Maine will not interpose.

Mr. FRYE. If all that was done by unanimous consent was an agreement that it should be considered as the unfinished business, of course I have no right to ask it.

Mr. BERRY. It was all done by unanimous consent this morning.

Mr. FRYE. The special order does not take the place of the unfinished business, but unless this is disposed of the special order should be laid before the Senate as the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. What is the special order?

Mr. FRYE. The Alaska fur-seal bill.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. President, in order to aid the Senate in arriving at the true merits of all the matters alleged to be in controversy between the United States and the State of Arkansas, and in order to fully understand and know upon what basis said adjustment and settlement reported in Senate Executive Document No. 91, Fifty-third Congress, third session, equitably rest, I should like to know, and in my opinion the Senate should officially know, from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, over his signature, brought down to January 1, 1896, sundry matters hereinafter specifically enumerated, as the same now officially appear from his own records, and not otherwise.

This precaution is taken for the reasons following, to wit:

1. Because in said agreement, item 5, a credit of $150,000 is given said State for her claim to 30,000 acres of "indemnity school lands" not of record in the General Land Office at the date of said agreement, but said credit was based exclusively upon the ex parte affidavit of her own State agent, copy of which is as follows, to wit:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, D. C., ss:

Thomas G. Riley, on his oath, being duly sworn, makes the following statement:

I was appointed by the governor of the State of Arkansas in February, 1886, to look after the interests of the State of Arkansas growing out of the swamp-land act of September 28, 1850, and was afterwards directed to look after the claim of said State for indemnity school lands.

Since the date of my appointment I have continuously resided in Washington, D. C., and have had, through the courtesy of the several Commissioners of the General Land Office, access to the tract books of the General Land Office.

To carry out the purposes of my designation as the agent of the State, I have examined said books with a view to determine the amount of cash indemnity and land indemnity due the State under the act of March 3, 1857; also to ascertain from the field notes the residue of swamp lands in place due the State under the act of September 28, 1850.

In addition to these duties as agent of said State I have ascertained the amount of school indemnity due the State by reason of the losses in the granted section (16) on account of fractional townships, and other losses to said section growing out of natural causes, i. e., the existence of rivers, lakes, etc., the meandering of which by the public survey lessened to that extent the amount of school lands allowed by law.

I have filed but one list for indemnity school lands, that of December 10, 1890, for 2,073.85 acres, of which amount 1,792.85 acres are held to be "apparently valid," though not yet approved.

In addition to this list I have prepared, since the year 1890, four other lists of indemnity school lands from bases above described. I am positive the bases of these selections were valid. I took these lists to Division "K" of the General Land Office for the purpose of filing, but was there advised that they could not be accepted by reason of an informality—namely, there were no nonmineral affidavits accompanying said lists. These lists were then returned to the governor of Arkansas for the purpose of securing the requisite affidavits. The lists have not yet been returned for filing. The lands selected in these four lists amounted to 30,000 acres, and the bases for the selections were valid.

THOMAS G. RILEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 16th day of January, 1895.

[SEAL.] WM. H. DE LACY, Notary Public.

Upon this item the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his said report of November 17, 1894, printed on pages 13, 14, and 15 of House Report 1959, Fifty-third Congress, third session, says as follows, to wit:

In regard to the amount of lieu land (sections 16) disposed of by the United States, the only way of ascertaining that fact would be to go through all the tract books, examine the sixteenth sections for any entries that may be shown, and also as to whether the State has selected indemnity for such entries, should any be found. This would be a work of weeks if not months.

There is one list of school indemnity selections by the State of Arkansas on file remaining unadjusted, embracing in the aggregate 2,074.55 acres, which appears to be valid and free from objection, except as to 280 acres, in which the basis has already been satisfied.

2. Because a credit in a lump sum of $348,544.06 in said agreement (item 13) is given said State for her claim to 906,260 acres of land alleged by her to be swamp, and cash indemnity for lands also alleged by her to be swamp, but not then of official record in the General Land Office; but said credit was based exclusively upon another ex parte affidavit of her said agent, wherein it is recited that he believed that 506,000 of said 906,260 acres of land were swamp, and wherein it is also recited that although said agent had not then examined the field notes thereof that he believed that 400,000 of said 906,260 acres are of the same class, and wherein it is also recited that about 50,000 of said 906,260 acres had not even been surveyed, all of which is shown by his affidavit, as follows, to wit:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, D. C., ss:

Thomas G. Riley, on oath, being duly sworn, makes the following statement:

That he was appointed by the governor of Arkansas, in March, 1886, to examine the records, files, tract books, and plat books of the General Land Office for the purpose of determining therefrom the amount of swamp lands in place due the State under the act of September 28, 1850; also the indemnity due the State under the acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857; that in pursuance of these duties he has from time to time filed various lists, which have been in part acted upon by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

That he has prepared lists embracing 506,000 acres of land not heretofore selected, and which have not been, but are now ready to be, filed in the General Land Office; that from a careful and painstaking examination of the field notes of survey, for each 40-acre tract embraced in said lists, he believes that the greater portion of each 40-acre tract included in said list is swamp and overflowed land within the meaning of the swamp-land act.

That he believes the State entitled to all said lands or indemnity therefor.

That he has not yet finished the examination of the field notes of the State, and it is his opinion, from a careful estimate of the amount and character of the lands in the State, the field notes of which he has not yet examined, that there remains over and above said lists of 506,000 acres other swamp lands to the amount of 400,000 acres. This will include about 50,000 acres of what are known as "sunk lands," heavily timbered and not yet surveyed.

THOS. G. RILEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 15th day of February, 1895.

[SEAL.] WM. H. DE LACY, Notary Public.

3. Because credit (items 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12) is given said State at the rate of $5 per acre for the alleged residue, respectively, of each of her several grants as named in said items.

One of said credits is based upon a report of the General Land Office, to wit: His annual report for the fiscal year 1850–51, forty-five years ago, while another credit is based upon a letter dated February 28, 1885, concerning all of which said report of said Commissioner of November 17, 1894, recites as follows, to wit:

Grants in aid of education and for other purposes.—Statement showing the status of the claim of the State of Arkansas, under its State grants, remaining unsettled on November 8, 1894.

In regard to the grant for internal improvements, the Commissioner's report for the fiscal year 1850–51, page 8, shows the status of the grant at that time to have been as follows:

	Acres.
Amount granted	500,000.00
Amount approved	499,889.03
Deficit	110.97

In regard to the seminary grant, by letter to Paul M Cobb, commissioner of State lands, dated February 28, 1885, volume 22, press copy, page 103, it was stated that the State was still entitled to select an amount not exceeding 6,223.31 acres in satisfaction of said grant. It does not appear that any selections have been made, in view of the above statement, and it is probable that the State is still entitled to the above amount under the grant for a seminary.

To verify these statements from the records would, I should say, take the time of an expert accountant for two or three weeks, the records being so faulty.

Considering the deficit in the internal improvement grant of 110.97 acres, deficit in the seminary grant, 6,223.31 acres, and the unadjusted list of school indemnity selections, 2,074.55 acres, the entire amount which the records show the State may claim under the several grants is 8,408.83 acres.

In the absence of a specific statement showing what is claimed by the State, the above is the best statement that can be made without a full review of all the selections under each grant made since the admission of the State into the Union in 1836.

4. Because credit is given said State in cases wherein, as recited in said report of said Commissioner of November 17, 1894, "a number of said tracts of land are in conflict with the claims of individuals, who contest the allegation that the lands are swamp in fact, and wherein said contest had not then been determined"; and in other cases where said State alleged claims to certain land that "the lands to which said State can assert no legitimate claim, and but for said act of August 4, 1894, would be rejected"; and again in other cases, where said State claimed title to still other lands, that "said lands had been approved and certified to said State under other grants, and under the decision of the Interior Department said State can not properly assert a claim to title thereto"; and because in still other cases that "title subsequent to the date of the indemnity laws (March 3, 1857) had passed to individuals, and hence such lands could not, under the law, be patented to said State, and hence also under existing laws said lands in the General Land Office were classified as unadjustable," and all of which more fully appears from said report of said Commissioner, as follows, to wit:

Claim under the swamp-land laws.—By the swamp-land grant of September 28, 1850 (9 U. S. Stat., 519), all the swamp lands then existing and not already disposed of in Arkansas were granted to the said State. The quantity granted is indefinite, since no other designation of the lands was given in the law than "swamp and overflowed lands."

By the confirmatory act of March 3, 1857 (11 U. S. Stat., 251), the claim to all lands reported on that date to the General Land Office, under the swamp-land grant, was confirmed to the State as swamp lands, whether they were of such character or not.

By the indemnity sections of the acts of March 2, 1855 (10 U. S. Stats., 634), and March 3, 1857 (11 U. S. Stat., 251), the State was granted cash and land indemnity in lieu of swamp lands granted, but sold to individuals up to the date of the passage of the said acts. No indemnity is authorized by law for swamp lands sold by the United States after the date of the passage of the confirmatory act of March 3, 1857.

There has been selected or claimed for or by the State under the swamp-land grant 8,656,372.89 acres, and of this quantity 7,673,555.16 acres have been patented as swamp lands. (Report of Commissioner General Land Office for 1894.)

There remains unsettled on the selection records of the division of swamp lands of this office a claim representing about 623,160 acres, as shown by a tabulated statement, with descriptive exhibits corresponding with the columns in the statement herewith submitted.

Exhibit No. 1 shows the lands approved to the State and which might be patented at this time but for the passage of the act approved August 4, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas."

Exhibit No. 2 shows lands reported to the General Land Office prior to March 3, 1857, and which are, therefore, confirmed to the State. But for the act of August 4, 1894, these lands might be approved and patented.

Exhibit No. 3 shows lands reported or selected subsequent to March 3, 1857, and which are subject to adjustment. The claim of the State to a number of the tracts is in conflict with the claims of individuals, who contest the allegation that the lands are swamp lands in fact. The claim of the State to other tracts is not contested. The material question as to whether these lands are swamp lands or not has not as yet been determined.

Exhibit No. 4 shows lands disposed of to individuals, under locations made under the general land laws, between the dates of September 28, 1850, and March 3, 1857. If due proof is made by the State that the lands were in fact swamp lands at the date of the grant, the State will receive certificates authorizing it to locate an equal acreage of agricultural lands in lieu of the swamp land proved to have been lost.

The exhibit also shows the claim of the State for cash indemnity where the lands were entered by individuals under cash purchases.

Exhibit No. 5 shows lands to which the State can assert no legitimate claim, since the lands had already been disposed of at the date of the grant, and were, therefore, excepted from the provisions of the grant. But for the suspension of settlements by reason of the act of August 4, 1894, the improper claim of record might be rejected.

Exhibit No. 6 shows lands claimed by the State as swamp lands and by railroads, claiming under the State, as nonswamp lands. Having been approved and certified to the State under one grant, it can not properly assert a claim to the same lands under another grant. (See State of Arkansas vs. St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, 10 L. D., 145.) The claim of the State on the basis of these lands might also be rejected but for the act of August 4, 1894.

Exhibit No. 7 shows lands the title to which passed to individuals subsequent to the indemnity period. The lands being patented to individuals, they can not be also patented to the State; and having been sold after the indemnity period, they can not under the law be made the subject of an indemnity claim. Hence they are classified as "unadjustable" under existing laws.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Wherefore, for these and other reasons, I should like the Committee on the Public Lands to fully and exactly inform the Senate, and if said committee is not in possession of the data sufficient and necessary to so answer the same, then and in that event I would like the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior to fully and exactly answer the inquiries as follows, to wit:

1. How many acres of land as "swamp land in place" are now due the State of Arkansas?

How many acres are now due her as "indemnity for swamp lands"?

How many acres are due her as "indemnity under her school-land grant"?

How many acres are due her under her "court-house and jail grant"?

How many acres are due her under her "internal-improvement grant"?

How many acres are due her under the act of June 23, 1836, for "seminary purposes"?

How many acres are due her under the act of March 2, 1831, for the "erection of public buildings"?

How many acres are due her under the act of June 23, 1836, for "completing public buildings"?

How many acres are due her under her "salt-spring grant" of June 23, 1836?

2. Were the 125,000 acres of land (item 1 of said credit account) selected by said State prior or subsequent to March 3, 1857?

What part thereof, if any, has been examined and found to be not of the character of lands contemplated by Congress to be granted said State under the swamp-land act of September 28, 1850? (9 U. S. Stats., 519.)

How many acres of these lands are now being contested in the Interior Department by settlers and other persons upon the ground that said lands are not in fact swamp and overflowed?

3. Is not item No. 2 of said account—90,400 acres—for lands disposed of to settlers and others, under the general land laws of the United States? And if so, is not said State entitled to select other lands in lieu of those disposed of, and is it not entitled to cash indemnity therefor? Has said State made due proof, according to the rules and regulations of the General Land Office, that said lands were in fact swamp and overflowed at the date of the swamp-land grant, or has the credit in the sum of $452,000 been allowed said State solely upon the claim made by her therefor, without such due proof? Upon what theory, legal or equitable, can said State be allowed by the United States, a cash indemnity of $452,000, or at the rate of $5 per acre, for such alleged losses which would not and could not be asserted with equal force and justice against the United States by any of the other public-land States which were in the Union on September 28, 1850, which were entitled to all the benefits of the swamp-land grant of that date? Would not such allowance of said sum of $452,000, to enable said State to cancel, pro tanto, its indebtedness to the United States, prove a practical and actual loss to the United States in the sum of $452,000, and because of the present policy of the United States, making said land enterable under the homestead laws?

4. What part of the 118,760 acres (item 3 of said credit account), if any, were entered prior to September 28, 1850? What part thereof was entered subsequent to September 28, 1850, and prior to March 2, 1855? What part thereof was entered between March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857? What part thereof was entered between March 3, 1857, and the present time? And has the State of Arkansas submitted due proof, showing that said lands were, in fact, swamp on September 28, 1850, and upon what authority has such credit been allowed?

5. Upon what authority was the credit of $79,900 (item 4 of said credit account) allowed said State, said sum being for 63,920 acres of land, at $1.25 per acre, claimed by said State to be swamp, but probably disposed of by the United States subsequent to the act of March 2, 1855 (10 U. S. Stats., 634), or subsequent to the act of March 3, 1857 (11 U. S. Stats., 200)?

6. What induced the allowance to said State of the sum of $348,544.06 (item 13 of said credit account), being a credit for "278,835 acres of land, being about one-fourth of 906,260 acres of land, claimed as swamp land in place, and as a basis of land and cash indemnity under the aforesaid acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, at $1.25 per acre, in satisfaction of the whole claim," which appears to have been allowed without any claim thereto theretofore filed in the General Land Office as a basis therefor, but seems to rest solely upon a statement signed Thomas G. Riley as late as February 15, 1895?

The Senate should know whether said claim has yet been filed, and if so, when, and whether any part of the acreage embraced in this item can be approved, certified, and patented to said State under the swamp-land laws and the rules and regulations of the Interior Department?

7. Under what law and upon what principle or theory is it just or expedient for Congress to allow said State in said settlement the rate of $5 per acre for any residue of lands alleged to be due her under her "school," "court-house," "jail," "internal improvement," "seminary," "public buildings," and "salt springs" grants, originally made by Congress without price and at dates when the Government price of the public lands in said State was $1.25 per acre? If so, upon what theory or construction of law could similar claims be denied to the other public-land States?

8. Under what law and upon what principle or theory of law is it expedient for Congress to allow said State in said settlement the rate of $5 per acre upon a mere alleged right of a float, vesting in said State to select indemnity under the aforesaid acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857? If so, upon what theory or construction of law could similar claims be denied to the other public-land States?

9. Under what law and upon what principle or theory is it just or expedient for Congress to allow said State in said settlement the rate of $1.25 per acre for all lands therein alleged to be, and claimed by said State to be, swamp and overflowed without subjecting said claim to all the ordinary and usual tests to which similar claims of the other public-land States, grantees thereof, are subjected under the rules and regulations of the Interior Department?

10. If the State of Arkansas is legally entitled to receive any residue of any grant alleged to be due her, why has she not already selected the same and acquired legal evidence of title thereto in the usual way and have duly disposed of the same for $1.25 or for $5 or for $10 per acre (the last being their alleged value, as recited in some of the 65 affidavits referred to in Senate Executive Document 91, Fifty-third Congress, third session, and alluded to by the Senator from Arkansas this morning)?

11. Full explanation should be made to the Senate between the seeming discrepancies on the one hand in the report of the General Land Office made January 5, 1888, and recited on pages 74 and 75, Appendix L, Senate Report 236, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, wherein it was recited that the acreage of land in the State of Arkansas claimed by said State as swamp and overflowed land aggregated, according to the report made January 5, 1888, 8,655,211.10 acres, of which there had been then patented 7,503,196.13 acres, making a difference of acreage of 1,152,013.97 acres, which difference, as recited in said report, embraced as follows, to wit:

The difference between the amount selected and the amount patented to the State (1,152,013.97 acres) is not the actual amount of land now in dispute. It embraces many duplicate selections; all the lands for which the claim of the State has been rejected; many tracts disposed of both before and after the date of the swamp grant by sales, or locations of warrants and scrip, or under other grants to the State, and numerous tracts covered by claims adverse to the State, yet to be determined, as well as for those for which the question of title between the State and the United States only remains to be decided. Separate records of these different classes have never been made up, so that the amount of land already selected to which the State is entitled can not even be estimated.

The full report so referred to is as follows, to wit:

APPENDIX L.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 24th instant I have the honor to advise you that the lands selected by the State of Arkansas under the swamp grant of September 28, 1850, amount to 8,655,210.10 acres. Notice of these selections was given the local officers for the district in which the lands were situated as soon as practicable after the surveyor-general approved the selection, and the instructions given required that said lands be withheld from sale or entry; but in many cases lands were sold or entered before notice of the State's claim reached the local office, and in a number of other cases the lands selected have been found not to be swamp or overflowed within the meaning of the grant, and the claim of the State rejected and the lands opened to settlement and entry, so that the amount of land now withheld from disposition is not known and could not be ascertained without a detailed examination of the records of both this and the several local offices in the State, which would require several months.

Of the lands selected and reported to this office, 7,659,619.13 acres have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and 7,503,196.13 acres have been patented to the State under the grant. The difference between the amount selected and the amount patented to the State (1,152,013.97 acres) is not the actual amount of land now in dispute. It embraces many duplicate selections; all the lands for which the claim of the State has been rejected; many tracts disposed of both before and after the date of the swamp grant by sales, or locations of warrants and scrip, or under other grants to the State, and numerous tracts covered by claims adverse to the State, yet to be determined, as well as for those for which the question of title between the State and United States only remains to be decided. Separate records of these different classes have never been made up, so that the amount of land already selected to which the State is entitled can not even be estimated.

Under date of November 2, 1850, a circular (see Lester's Land Laws, vol. 1, p. 543) setting forth the provisions of the grant of September 20, 1850, with instructions thereunder, and allowing the States to elect which of two methods they would adopt for the purpose of designating the swamp lands, was sent to the governors of the States to which the grant applied. These methods are:

First. The field notes of Government survey to be taken as the basis for selections, and the lands shown by them to be swamp or overflowed within the meaning of the act, which were vacant and unappropriated September 28, 1850, would pass to the State.

Second. The selections to be made by State agents and reported to the United States surveyor-general for the district, with proof of the character of the lands.

By an act approved January 6, 1851, the legislature of the State of Arkansas provided for making selections according to the second method, which has since formed the basis of selections in said State.

Recently the State authorities sought to have the method of adjusting the claims of the State under the swamp-land acts changed, but so far they have not met the requirements of the Department in the matter. (See 4 L. D., 295–297, and 5 Id., 636.)

The regulations governing the adjustment of cases where persons seek to file claims for or enter lands claimed as swamp which have not been approved and certified to the States are contained in the inclosed circular of December 13, 1886. After such approval and certification the State's claim can only be contested upon a showing that the approval was the result of fraud or mistake, unless the applicant alleges some right under the public land laws acquired prior to the approval.

Under the acts of Congress approved March 2, 1855 (10 Stat., 634), and March 3, 1857 (11 Stat., 251), indemnity is allowed for lands entered with cash or located with warrants or scrip between September 28, 1850, and March 3, 1857, upon proof by the State that such lands were swamp or overflowed within the meaning of the grant of 1850. If the land was entered with cash the purchase money is paid over to the State, except in cases where more than $1.25 per acre was received. In such cases the rule is to allow only $1.25 per acre. Where the land was located with warrants or scrip, certificates issue authorizing the location of a like amount of public land, subject to entry at $1.25 per acre, within the limits of the State. In case of those States in which there are no public lands subject to entry at the price aforesaid this office has for a number of years refused to issue such certificates.

There is no authority of law for allowing indemnity for swamp lands sold or located after March 3, 1857, or for lands entered under the homestead or other later laws.

The State of Arkansas has received no indemnity, either in money or land, and has submitted no proof with a view to obtaining indemnity to swamp lands.

Very respectfully, S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. THOMAS C. MCRAE,
House of Representatives.

On the other hand, in said House Report No. 1959, Fifty-third Congress, third session, it is recited that said State should be allowed by the United States certain credits for the alleged value of certain lands alleged by her to be swamp and for indemnity for certain other lands by her alleged to be swamp as follows, to wit:

	Acres.
$156,250 for her claim to	125,000
452,000 for her claim to	90,400
148,450 for her claim to	118,760
79,900 for her claim to	63,920
348,544 for her claim to	906,260
1,185,144 for her claim to	1,304,340
From which acreage deduct	1,152,013
Being the aforesaid difference, thereby leaving	152,327

in excess of the total acreage of lands selected by said State as swamp lands, as the same appear of official record in the General Land Office on June 30, 1895.

In other words, notwithstanding the said duplicate selections of swamp lands so made by said State, so recorded, and of her claim to alleged swamp land, so officially rejected after being recorded, the State of Arkansas has had patented to her 7,503,196.13 acres of land as swamp lands, and in addition thereto by said agreement is to be paid the sum of $1,185,144 for 1,304,340 acres of other lands alleged by her to be swamp, being 152,325 acres of land, alleged by her to be swamp land, more than said State has ever even selected, and now of official record in the General Land Office.

12. In this same line of claims of said State to lands by her alleged to be swamp under the said swamp-land act of September 28, 1850, and the indemnity swamp-land acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, special attention is also called to pages 300–302 of the annual report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated October 1, 1895, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, wherein it is recited that the total number of

Acres patented by Arkansas as swamp lands was	7,673,005.16
Total number of acres rejected by the United States as swamp lands was	1,144,612.16
Total number of acres of swamp-land indemnity unadjusted was	209,160.00
Total aggregate	9,027,777.32
From which deduct total acreage selected by the State of Arkansas as swamp land and of record officially in the General Land Office on June 30, 1895	8,656,373.29
Difference	371,405.03

Showing that there had been patented or rejected, or remain to be adjusted, 371,405.03 acres of land treated as swamp in excess of the total acreage of land selected by said State as swamp lands and of record in the General Land Office on June 30, 1895. Results like these surely should be duly inquired into and clearly and satisfactorily explained to the Senate before it should confirm the agreement recited in Senate Executive Document No. 91, Fifty-third Congress, third session, or now pass Senate bill No. 502.

The official tables from which the foregoing information was obtained, taken from pages 300–302 of said Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, are as follows, to wit:

I. SECTION OF SWAMP LANDS.—SWAMP LANDS IN PLACE.

The following tables will show work done in the adjustment of claims for swamp lands in place:

*Under the act of March 2, 1849, which applies to Louisiana only, certified copies of approved lists, having the force and effect of patents, are furnished the State.

13. But a showing as peculiar as this seems to be is not all; for, in addition to the aforesaid claims of said State under said three beneficial and liberal acts of Congress, there are recited in said agreement in Senate Executive Document 91, reservations probably of vast proportions, a recognition certainly of the claim of said State to other and additional acres of lands as swamp, and which reservations are in words as follows, to wit:

The parties hereto agree that the land now patented, approved, or confirmed to the State of Arkansas under the acts of September 28, 1850, March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, shall constitute the full measure due the State under the said swamp-land acts, except, however, that the lands described in the following lists shall be patented to the State, namely: List No. 1, containing 12,640 acres, denominated "Approved, but not listed"; and list No. 2, containing 4,960 acres, denominated "Confirmed, but not listed," which lists were transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior on November 17, 1894, by letter "M" of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

It is also agreed that any person who has heretofore filed a declaration of preemption, resides on, cultivates, or has purchased, under the laws of the State of Arkansas, any selected and unconfirmed swamp land hereby relinquished to the United States, his heirs or assigns, shall have the preference right for one year from this date to purchase such land from the United States at the minimum price for public lands, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Nothing in this settlement and agreement is intended to or shall in any connection be held to prejudice the right of the State of Arkansas to assert and establish her title to any lands which were granted or confirmed to her by the said acts approved September 28, 1850, March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, in so far as the same is disputed by those claiming under any subsequent grant made or claimed to have been made, the scope and purpose of this settlement being hereby declared to be the adjustment of all disputes between the United States and the State of Arkansas, and to leave undisturbed incidental controversies between said State and other parties in which the United States is not beneficially interested.

But it is agreed by the party of the second part that any person who has heretofore entered any such patented, approved, or confirmed swamp lands under the homestead or other law of the United States shall have the preference right for one year from this date to purchase such land from the State at the minimum price fixed by law for such land, upon exhibiting to the commissioner of State lands the patent receiver's receipt or certificate issued by the United States for such land.

In testimony whereof we have hereunto subscribed our respective names this the day and year first above written.

J. G. CARLISLE,
Secretary of the Treasury.
HOKE SMITH,
Secretary of the Interior.
JAMES P. CLARKE,
Governor of Arkansas.

Not only do the foregoing recitals absolutely confirm to the State of Arkansas an additional acreage of swamp lands, but they open up new, fresh, and it may be large fields of contention for still an additional acreage of swamp lands.

Where or before what tribunal shall said State duly assert and finally establish her title to any land as swamp alleged by her to inure to her under the aforesaid acts of September 28, 1850, March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, except before the Secretary of the Interior? The swamp-land laws make said Secretary the sole tribunal to fully hear and finally determine all questions as to whether any lands in Arkansas are swamp or not; and is it intended in this case to change the law in that regard so far as Arkansas is a claimant for swamp lands? And if not, then any defeat of any claimant before him "claiming under a subsequent grant made, or claimed to have been made," is simply to enable the Interior Department to add to the success of that State by passing title to additional acres of land as swamp after this settlement shall have been concluded, all words to the contrary notwithstanding, as recited in said agreement, to wit:

The scope and purpose of this settlement being hereby declared to be the adjustment of all disputes between the United States and the State of Arkansas, and to leave undisturbed incidental controversies between said State and other parties in which the United States is not beneficially interested.

In addition thereto, the plain English of the words in said agreement, as follows, to wit—

But it is agreed by the party of the second part that any person who has heretofore entered any patented, approved, or confirmed swamp lands under the homestead or other law of the United States shall have the preference right for one year from this date to purchase such land from the State at the minimum price fixed by law for such land, upon exhibiting to the commissioner of State lands the patent, receiver's receipt, or certificate issued by the United States for such land—means simply to turn over to the tender mercy of the commissioner of State lands of Arkansas, without supervision or protection by the United States, all United States homestead settlers and other persons in that State to whom have heretofore been issued United States patents, United States receiver's receipts, or United States certificates by the proper United States land officers, for lands declared by them to be public lands of the United States and disposable under the various public land and settlement laws of the United States, under and by which said patents, said receipts, and said certificates so referred to were issued. In view of the fact that section 5 of the admission act of Arkansas, approved June 23, 1836 (5 U. S. Stats., 59), provides that—

The general assembly of Arkansas shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to the bona fide purchasers thereof—it is difficult to see how any such article of agreement as the foregoing finds a proper place therein.

Congress is capable and should protect all claimants to any of the public lands in Arkansas without the leave, permission, or agreement at this date of the State of Arkansas.

So far as the Senate now knows, the language used in the aforesaid reservations may hereafter prove a nettle, if not a nest egg of danger, out of which, sooner or later, may be hatched other and new broods of complications, sufficient it may be to swallow up not only the $160,000, principal and interest, which said State in said agreement promises to protect (page 10 of House Report 1959), but may eventually bring the United States largely in debt to said State, so that an unbefitting sequel hereto may possibly be that after this magnificent donation of millions of acres of land and this donation of millions of dollars of money to said State the United States may again be compelled to go into its public Treasury for additional sums of money to terminate and rid itself of this contention, now half a century old, more or less.

In addition thereto the State of Arkansas has also made claim against the United States for 5 per cent of the value of all lands in that State disposed of by military bounty land warrants and scrip and entered under the homestead laws, or 5 per cent of the fees received from said homestead entries (see House Report No. 1571, Fifty-second Congress, first session, made by Mr. MCRAE of Arkansas).

In that report, made June 3, 1892, it appears that the claim of the State of Arkansas then made, and demand therefor by her insisted upon, was not only for a credit of 5 per cent of the legal value of all lands located in that State with military bounty land warrants and scrip, but also for a credit of 5 per cent of the legal value of all lands entered in that State under the homestead laws of the United States; and, in fact, has insisted upon a credit of 5 per cent of the legal value of all lands undisposed of within her borders in 1836, valued at $1.25 per acre, aggregating a sum of $922,404.91, claimed by her to be then due her by the United States as her 5 per cent fund.

On page 9 of said report Mr. MCRAE recites the claim and demand of the State of Arkansas as to lands located with warrants and scrip and entered under the homestead laws, in words following:

"The State (Arkansas) also insists that, as a matter of common fairness, she ought to be credited with 5 per cent on lands entered under the homestead laws and located with military bounty land warrants and scrip, estimated at the minimum price for Government lands—$1.25 per acre. In 1836, when the State was admitted into the Union, there was no way of disposing of public lands except by cash sale or for warrants and scrip.

"The homestead law was not passed until 1862, and the State, with such a contract as it made, does not think it just that the General Government should be allowed to adopt a policy that will have the effect to diminish the fund upon which she had a right to rely for the payment of the debt in question.

"The greater part of all lands disposed of in Arkansas within the last thirty years have been entered under the homestead law. Up to June 30, 1887, as shown by the letter of the Commissioner, the aggregate of such lands taken as homesteads and with bounty warrants and scrip was 7,795,451.02 acres. (See Appendix J.) For this land the Government received as fees the sum of $502,085. (See Appendix K.) Estimating these lands at the minimum price then and now fixed by law, the State, if her claim should be allowed, would be entitled to the sum of $487,215.65 more than has been allowed on this account—nearly twice as much as she has been allowed on sales under the present rulings. She is certainly entitled at least to 5 per cent of the fees received by the Government for lands disposed of in the State."

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 28th ultimo, asking to be informed of the area of lands in Arkansas entered under the homestead laws and located with military bounty land warrants and scrip since the admission of the State into the Union, and in reply you are informed that the areas of public lands thus disposed of to June 30, 1887, are as follows:

	Acres.
Area of original homestead entries	5,531,344.10
Area of military bounty land warrant locations	2,263,226.92
Area of scrip locations	880.00
Total	7,795,451.02

Very respectfully,

T. J. ANDERSON,
Assistant Commissioner.

Hon. T. C. MCRAE,
House of Representatives.

APPENDIX K.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1889.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 10th ultimo, requesting to be informed of the amount received as fees upon public lands entered in the State of Arkansas, and in reply thereto you are informed that the amount of money so received to June 30, 1888, is $502,085.

The figures above given are approximately correct.

Very respectfully,

T. J. ANDERSON,
Assistant Commissioner.

Hon. T. C. MCRAE,
House of Representatives.

Said claims of Arkansas so there recited and insisted upon are in perfect harmony with the act of the legislature of that State approved April 8, 1889, still an existing statute, recited on page 1054, section 4560, of the Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas, by Sandels & Hill, for 1894, which is in these words, to wit:

SEC. 4560. The governor is authorized and requested to take all necessary steps to secure to the State from the United States the 5 per cent of the proceeds of sales of public lands of the United States provided for in the act of admission, including the value of lands disposed of as homesteads and for military bounty land warrants and scrip; all swamp and overflowed lands granted to the State by the act approved September 28, 1850, or other acts; the proceeds of all swamp and overflowed lands which have been sold by the United States since the grant thereof to this State or which may be hereafter sold for cash; indemnity lands; lands or scrip or cash therefor, in lieu of swamp or overflowed lands which have been or may hereafter be disposed of otherwise than by sale; all other rights, interest, claims, and demands the State may have or be entitled to under existing or future laws and grants from or against the United States, whether in relation to public lands or otherwise.

The claims so clearly enumerated in said section No. 4560 seem to be still live, subsisting claims of said State against the United States, never heretofore expressly waived or specifically abandoned by said State, or if waived at all, must be by virtue of some consideration contemplated to be received therefor under cover of some of the general recitals contained in said agreement (Senate Executive Document 91, Fifty-third Congress, third session).

Have the United States an anxiety to purchase from the State of Arkansas her mere alleged claim or right to select a certain acreage of the public lands situate therein which is so great as to justify Congress to pay $5 or even $1.25 per acre for such claim or right, influenced thereto merely to enable and aid that State to thereby liquidate a large money debt now due by her to the United States?

Would the United States ever exercise such claim or right, even if so paid for in money; and if so, how and by what machinery and for what purpose would it ever be exercised?

If the United States can legally and properly cancel outright the whole of said money debt now so due by said State, and can legally and properly grant said State and liquidate by payment each and every item of all of her alleged claims against the United States as by her now or heretofore alleged, it were far better then to do so than for Congress to engage in serious legislation by ratifying this so-called "settlement," declared in the minority report of the Committee on Public Lands in the third session of the Fifty-third Congress to be "a one-sided affair, not just to the Government." That was the report of an able minority of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-third Congress, the chairman of which was Maj. JOHN F. LACEY, of my own State, who is perhaps as familiar with the public-land history of this Government as any man in the other branch of Congress.

The State of Arkansas in the past has made haste very slowly in liquidating her obligations due the United States, and while there is, and it is proper that at all times there should be, a desire on the part of Congress to speedily adjust upon the principles of fairness and terminate any matter of controversy and contention between the United States and any of the several States of the Union, yet in this case it would seem that results more satisfactory to the Senate, and not less mutually equitable to the United States and the State of Arkansas, would be secured if additional time were consumed wherein to more fully examine into the details and the merits of all these matters.

Attention is called to the fact that in making said adjustment and agreement the official report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, addressed to the Secretary of the Interior on November 17, 1894, in response to his own request of October 6, 1894, in reference to "the several claims of the State of Arkansas against the United States then of record and remaining unadjusted," seems to have been either wholly or very largely ignored.

Said report of said Commissioner to said Secretary is printed on pages 13, 14, and 15 of House Report No. 1959, Fifty-third Congress, third session.

In the light of that carefully prepared official report of said Commissioner to said Secretary, devoted exclusively to said subject-matter, and for that purpose made special, it is difficult, if not impossible, to now see how any such agreement was reached as that submitted to the Senate on February 23, 1895, contained in Senate Executive Document 91, Fifty-third Congress, third session, and which Congress is asked to ratify and approve by the passage of Senate bill No. 502.

The findings of fact contained in said report, made by said Commissioner on November 17, 1894, seem so inconsistent with the recitals contained in said agreement in said Executive Document 91, reported to the Senate February 23, 1895, and the recitals in the latter so inconsistent with those contained in said Annual Report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made as late as October 1, 1895, render it difficult, if not impossible, to satisfactorily harmonize the same.

If it be true that it is now difficult to finally and satisfactorily determine the merits of the mutual claims of the United States and the State of Arkansas with all the information submitted and all the light thrown thereon by two Secretaries, aided therein by their two representatives, then how much more difficult it must have been for Congress to heretofore satisfactorily determine these controversies without the aid of even said information?

Yet, as a fact, during the closing days of the second session of the Fifty-second Congress, to wit, on March 2–4, 1893 (RECORD, pages 2547, 2548, Fifty-second Congress, second session), the Senate concurred in a conference report finally adjusting not only the whole of the aforesaid Arkansas matter as recited in said agreement contained in Senate Executive Document No. 91, but also and in addition thereto undertook to finally adjust "all the claims and demands of said State against the United States for the 5 per cent fund allowances under the act of June 23, 1836," and which 5 per cent claims and demands do not seem to be specifically named in said agreement in said Senate Executive Document No. 91, but the money value of which claims and demands said State has alleged to be $487,215.65.

The action of said conference committee was prevented from becoming a law in 1893 only because of a point of order having been raised in the House "that the said matter came before the House improperly, by coming before it from a conference committee to which said subject-matter had never been referred for conference either by the Senate or by the House," as will fully appear from the proceedings had in the House under the titles "Settlers' rights and swamp-land grants" and "Settlement of agricultural public lands" (RECORD, pages 2624–2630), copy of which I now submit as a part of my remarks.

For these and other reasons which seem valid, but which I will not now further tax the time of the Senate to discuss, I think that this entire subject-matter should be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and a motion to that effect I now make—

First. For the purpose of having the aforesaid suggestions and inquiries being there and by it fully inquired into, and after mature examination had thereon that the results thereof may be duly reported to the Senate to enable it to more satisfactorily arrive at the true merits of every item of all the mutual claims recited in Senate Executive Document 91, Fifty-third Congress, third session, alleged to exist and now in controversy between the United States and the State of Arkansas; and Second. For the purpose of securing official and exact information thereon in order that the Senate may conform, as near as Congress can properly do so, with the views and wishes of the State of Arkansas as expressed by her legislature in its act approved April 8, 1889, recited as section 4560 of the "Digest of the statutes of Arkansas for 1894 of Sandells & Hill," said committee, when reporting back the aforesaid matters, shall also report to the Senate at the same time what amount of money would be included in an allowance by Congress to the State of Arkansas for 5 per cent of the value of all public lands in that State disposed of prior to January 1, 1896, for military bounty land warrants and scrip.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I wish to say a word in regard to the interest due on these bonds. It will be seen by an examination of the executive document to which I have already alluded, that the gross claim allowed against the State of Arkansas by the two Secretaries and their respective clerks amounts to sixteen hundred and odd thousand dollars. Eleven hundred and some odd thousand dollars of that is interest, computed simply to the maturity of the bonds. They based that calculation on the opinion of Attorney-General Olney. I do not wish to impute to Attorney-General Olney a lack of knowledge of the law. He is a gentleman of whose abilities I have the highest opinion, but Attorney-General Olney, like other people, may be liable to be mistaken. The great State of Arkansas itself by its legislature acknowledges this debt to amount in round numbers to two million seven hundred and odd thousand dollars. Her auditor of State, by his report to the general assembly of that great State, certifies that the debt due to the Government from that State is two million seven hundred and odd thousand dollars. All parties agree that the law of Arkansas itself, which created and authorized the issuance of these bonds, provided that they should bear interest until paid—not until their maturity. It was different with the case of the bonds of the State of North Carolina. Those bonds simply bore the interest stated on their face, and the Supreme Court said that they were only to pay interest to their maturity. Not so with the State of Arkansas, for the law of the State specifies that they shall bear interest until they are paid in full.

Mr. President, I have no wish to antagonize the State of Arkansas. Whatever claim a great State like that may have against the Government of the United States which is honest and just I would pay her, and I would pay her just as quickly and just as cheerfully as I would vote an allowance to the State that I have the honor in part to represent. There should be equal and even-handed justice between the Government and the State of Arkansas and between the Government and all the other land-grant States.

It should be borne in mind, however, that this settlement runs over about sixty years, and there are many things in it that need careful examination and full explanation. That careful examination should be had, and that explanation should be made, Mr. President, and that is the reason why I move that the bill be recommitted to the committee.

APPENDIX A.

[Fifty-third Congress, third session. House of Representatives. Report No. 1959.]

COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE STATE OF ARKANSAS.

February 28, 1895.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NEILL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 8944:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8944) "to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas," have had the same under consideration, and report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The compromise as agreed upon by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury and the honorable Secretary of the Interior on the part of the United States, and the Hon. James P. Clarke, governor, on the part of the State of Arkansas, is attached hereto, together with the report of the commission appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and report upon the matters in dispute, all of which is made a part of this report.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, District of Columbia, ss:

This indenture, made this 23d day of February, 1895, between John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury, and Hoke Smith, Secretary of the Interior, under the power and authority conferred by an act of Congress approved August 4, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas," parties of the first part, and James P. Clarke, governor of the State of Arkansas, acting under the power conferred by the general assembly of the State of Arkansas, approved April 8, 1889, party of the second part, witnesseth:

That for and in consideration of the agreements and acts of the party of the second part, hereinafter more fully set forth, the parties of the first part by these presents hereby make the following agreement, subject to the approval by Congress:

1. To surrender to the party of the second part for cancellation 500 6 per cent coupon bonds of $1,000 each, numbered from 1 to 500, inclusive, dated January 1, 1838, and matured October 26, 1861, issued by the State of Arkansas to secure a loan from the Smithsonian fund, and now held and owned by the United States.

2. To surrender the coupons attached thereto, representing the unpaid accumulated interest on said bonds, amounting to the sum of $436,303.61.

3. To surrender similar bonds of the State under same date (38 in number) of $1,000 each, numbered 282 to 294, inclusive, 359 to 373, inclusive, and 401 to 410, inclusive, issued to secure a similar loan from the same fund, and matured January 1, 1868, and now owned by the United States.

4. To surrender the coupons attached thereto, representing the unpaid interest thereon to date of maturity, $59,280.

5. To surrender three bonds of $1,000 each, being State of Arkansas 5 per cent registered bonds, acquired for the Chickasaw orphan fund, with interest thereon from date of default to date of maturity, January 1, 1887, $5,700.

6. To surrender 92 of the 252 new 6 per cent coupon bonds, $1,000 each (Nos. 2099 to 2190, inclusive), issued by the State of Arkansas January 1, 1874, under the adjustment of the Chickasaw national fund, and maturing January 1, 1900, and now owned by the United States; also all coupons attached to said bonds, representing the accrued interest to January 1, 1895 (21 years), and amounting to $115,820.

7. To surrender for cancellation all the unpaid coupons to January 1, 1895, on the remainder of the 252 new 6 per cent ($1,000 each) Arkansas bonds, being 160 in number, and numbered from 2191 to 2350, inclusive, issued January 1, 1874, under the adjustment of the Chickasaw national fund, amounting in unpaid interest to $201,600.

In consideration of the surrender by the parties of the first part to the party of the second part the bonds, coupons, and accumulated amounts of interest herein above set forth, the party of the second part, by virtue of the powers aforesaid conferred upon him, hereby makes the following agreement, conditioned on the approval thereof by Congress, namely:

1. To cause to be paid into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $572 within thirty days after the approval by Congress of this settlement.

2. To cause to be paid, at or before their maturity (January 1, 1900), the remaining Arkansas bonds, being 160 in number, of $1,000 each, and all coupons attached thereto, as they severally come due, all coupons due on such bonds on January 1, 1895, being surrendered for cancellation, under the terms of this agreement, as above set forth. If the State elects to pay such bonds before their maturity, the payment of all interest accrued thereon to that date shall be accepted in full satisfaction of all the coupons, and the same may be surrendered with the bonds.

3. As a further consideration for the surrender of the aforesaid bonds, coupons, etc., the party of the second part hereby relinquishes and quitclaims to the United States all claims or demands, adjusted or unadjusted, growing out of the act of September 28, 1850, known as the swamp-land act; also all land or cash indemnity growing out of the acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857; also all claims for indemnity school lands; the residue of the salt-spring lands; the residue of the lands under the court-house and jail grant (act June 15, 1832); the residue of lands under act of September 4, 1841, for internal improvements; the residue of the grant under the acts of March 2, 1831, and June 3, 1836, for public buildings, and all other claims or demands of whatever nature or character.

The parties hereto agree that the land now patented, approved, or confirmed to the State of Arkansas under the acts of September 28, 1850, March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, shall constitute the full measure due the State under the said swamp-land acts, except, however, that the lands described in the following lists shall be patented to the State, namely: List No. 1, containing 12,640 acres, denominated "Approved, but not listed"; and list No. 2, containing 4,960 acres, denominated "Confirmed, but not listed," which lists were transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior on November 17, 1894, by letter "M" of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

It is also agreed that any person who has heretofore filed a declaration of preemption, resides on, cultivates, or has purchased, under the laws of the State of Arkansas, any selected and unconfirmed swamp land hereby relinquished to the United States, his heirs or assigns, shall have the preference right for one year from this date to purchase such land from the United States at the minimum price for public lands, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Nothing in this settlement and agreement is intended to or shall in any connection be held to prejudice the right of the State of Arkansas to assert and establish her title to any lands which were granted or confirmed to her by the said acts approved September 28, 1850, March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, in so far as the same is disputed by those claiming under any subsequent grant made or claimed to have been made, the scope and purpose of this settlement being hereby declared to be the adjustment of all disputes between the United States and the State of Arkansas, and to leave undisturbed incidental controversies between said State and other parties in which the United States is not beneficially interested.

But it is agreed by the party of the second part that any person who has heretofore entered any such patented, approved, or confirmed swamp lands under the homestead or other law of the United States shall have the preference right for one year from this date to purchase such land from the State at the minimum price fixed by law for such land, upon exhibiting to the commissioner of State lands the patent, receiver's receipt, or certificate issued by the United States for such land.

In testimony whereof we have hereunto subscribed our respective names this the day and year first above written.

J. G. CARLISLE,
Secretary of the Treasury.
HOKE SMITH,
Secretary of the Interior.
JAMES P. CLARKE,
Governor of Arkansas.

Report of Burton T. Doyle, representing the Secretary of the Treasury, and George C. Ross, representing the Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 18, 1895.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Secretary of the Treasury, and
Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Secretary of the Interior.

GENTLEMEN: In pursuance of your respective designation or appointment of us as your representatives or agents under the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas," approved August 4, 1894, we have the honor herewith to submit our report.

We find that the United States now own, in their own right, bonds of the State of Arkansas in the sum of $793,000, and the interest accrued thereon from the date of default in payment thereof by the State to the maturity of said bonds amounting in the aggregate, bonds and interest, to $1,611,803.61. (Interest on these bonds is not computed from and after the date of their maturity under the authority of the Attorney-General of the United States. See opinion filed herewith, dated February 14, 1895.) And that the State of Arkansas has various claims against the United States under the public-land laws of the United States for lands and indemnity claimed by her, and never allowed by the United States, which she offers as offset or counterclaim. The claims and counterclaims between the two governments are succinctly set forth in the form of a debit and credit account accompanying this report, marked "Account," in which the claims of the Government are given on the debit side of the account and the allowances conceded on the counterclaims made by the State are shown on the credit side of the account; and we desire to call your attention to this account, and make our report in the form of a narrative explanation of the items in it.

Soon after the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union the legislature thereof authorized the issue of $2,000,000 in 6 per cent interest-bearing coupon bonds of that State to run thirty years; and the United States, as the trustee of the Smithsonian fund, invested $538,000 of that fund in said bonds, getting 538 of such bonds at $1,000 each. The State of Arkansas defaulted in the payment of the interest on these bonds January 1, 1842; but as the State was entitled under the act of June 23, 1836 (5 Stat. U. S., 58), to 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sale by Congress of lands lying within its borders, the United States withheld these 5 per cent net earnings under the joint resolution of March 3, 1854 (5 Stat. U. S., 801, carried into the Revised Statutes of the United States as section 3481), to be applied to the liquidation of the interest on these bonds which the State had defaulted in paying.

On December 31, 1860, there had been so withheld by the United States $148,279.72, which the Secretary of the Treasury applied to the redemption of overdue interest coupons on 134 of the 538 bonds of the State held for the Smithsonian fund, which coupons were surrendered as follows: Thirty-seven coupons each from bonds numbered 1 to 133, inclusive, each coupon representing $30 (4,921 coupons, amounting to $147,630), which paid the interest on these 133 bonds to January 1, 1860; 21 coupons from bond No. 134 ($630), which paid the interest on that bond to January 1, 1852, and left $19.72 over, which remainder was credited on the next coupon left attached to said bond No. 134. Since that application no moneys so withheld by the United States have been actually applied to the payment of the interest accrued on any of these bonds, leaving accrued interest due on 366 of them from the date of default in payment by the State, January 1, 1842, to the date of their maturity, October 26, 1861; on 38 of them from date of default, January 1, 1842, to January 1, 1868; on 133 of them from the time to which that application paid it, January 1, 1860, to the date of maturity, October 26, 1861; and on 1 of them from the date to which that application paid the interest, January 1, 1852, to the date of maturity, October 26, 1861, less $19.72 credited on one of the retained coupons, making, in the aggregate, accrued and unpaid interest on these 538 bonds, $495,583.61; but there has been withheld and not yet applied $55,116.20, which is entered on the credit side of the account in favor of the State in this adjustment.

The United States, as the trustee of the Chickasaw fund, also invested $90,000 of that fund in the bonds of the State of this same issue; and the State defaulted in the payment of interest and principal; and the Secretary of the Interior, under the authority of the act of December 13, 1872 (17 Stat. U. S., 397), made an adjustment with the State of Arkansas in 1874, in pursuance of which the State of Arkansas funded these bonds and interest accrued thereon and issued, under date of January 1, 1874, 252 new 6 per cent coupon bonds, maturing January 1, 1900, on which no interest has been paid, leaving unpaid interest accrued and overdue on these 252 new bonds from January 1, 1874, to January 1, 1895, amounting to $317,520.

The United States also hold three 5 per cent registered bonds of that State purchased out of the Chickasaw orphan fund, with interest accrued thereon from the date of default to the date of maturity, January 1, 1849, to January 1, 1887, amounting to $5,700, making in all, bonds and interest, the aggregate above named, $1,611,803.61, which completes the debit side of the account.

CREDIT SIDE OF ACCOUNT.

Among other credits insisted on by the State are: 1. Five per cent of 16,676,465.85 acres, being, as alleged, "all the public lands then (1836) undisposed of within her borders," on the ground that the United States promised, on the admission of the State into the Union, "to turn over to the State 5 per cent of the proceeds of all public lands then undisposed of within her borders.

We do not think this contention of the State is tenable. The third section of the act for the admission of the State into the Union (5 Stat., 58) provides for the payment to the State of only "5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sale of lands lying within the State, and which shall be sold by Congress."

The claim, therefore, that the State was promised 5 per cent of the proceeds of "all public lands then undisposed of" is erroneous, for the admission of the State into the Union was upon her express agreement that she "shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States," and we do not think that the agreement to pay to the State 5 per cent of the net proceeds arising from the sale of lands carried with it any obligation, either express or implied, that the United States should not thereafter extend to the citizens of that State the privilege of acquiring free homes upon the public domain within its borders under the beneficent provisions of the homestead act, or the privilege accorded in the location by warrants and scrip.

Again, to admit the justice of this contention would establish a precedent by which other States, similarly organized, could rightfully claim the same considerations.

2. The State claims cash indemnity "for all lands sold by the United States which rightfully belonged to the State under the swamp-land act."

Independently of the fact that there is no law for the allowance of the claim so stated, we do not think the precedent made by its allowance a good one, even on a compromise. To carry out the intention of Congress for a "just and equitable" settlement we have submitted for your approval the following credits, upon the basis of certain land claims adjusted and unadjusted:

UNADJUSTED CLAIMS.

The unadjusted claims are such as have been made by the State as inuring thereto under the swamp-land act and other acts supplemental thereto. In most cases lists of selections have been filed under the claim that the field notes of the public surveys show that the lands included in these lists were swamp and overflowed within the meaning of the act of September 28, 1850, the State having elected to accept the showing made by the field notes. The United States, not having yet verified the claims of the State as to the showing made by these field notes, is not in a position at this time to dispute their justness.

Lists for land indemnity and cash indemnity under the acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, being supplementary to the act of September 28, 1850, have also been filed, the justness of which, for like reasons, we are not prepared to dispute.

An allowance of claims for land indemnity under said acts, as also for school-lands indemnity (hereinafter referred to), gives the State the right ipso facto to select lands of equal acreage from the public domain within the State. In such case the State would have the right to select from the residue of the public lands the most valuable nonmineral lands. From the list aforesaid and other claims for the residue of lands under special acts (below mentioned), the State claims that she has the right to select 132,434.27 acres of land to make up for losses sustained by the State.

The relinquishment of the right to select these lands, leaving the title thereto undisputed in the United States, carries with it an obligation on the part of the United States to give credit to the State for their present actual value. This we have endeavored to do by taking the sworn statements of more than 65 reputable people in various parts of the State, all well informed as to the value of Government lands within their respective counties. Many of the affiants were members of the present general assembly. From these statements it is found that the average valuation of the Government lands within the State is $1.25 per acre, and that the lands subject to selection are worth $5 per acre. Many of the affiants place the last-named lands at $10 per acre. The affidavits taken by us accompany this report.

We accordingly recommend the following credits, upon these facts:

1. The sum of $156,250, being the value of 125,000 acres of land at $1.25 per acre (Exhibit No. 3) listed and filed by the State as inuring thereto under the act of September 28, 1850, and shown by the Government field notes of the public surveys to be swamp and overflowed within the meaning of said act.

2. The sum of $452,000, being the value of 90,400 acres of land (Exhibit No. 4) selected and filed as a basis of land indemnity under acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, the claim of which is to be relinquished to the United States at $5 an acre.

4. The sum of $79,900, being the value of 63,920 acres of land (Exhibit No. 7) claimed to be swamp by the evidences of the field notes, and disposed of by the United States subsequent to the passage of the indemnity acts (supra) reclaimed, at $1.25 per acre.

5. The sum of $150,000, the same being for 30,000 acres of indemnity school land, at $5 per acre, to make up for deficiencies to the granted section (16) by reason of fractional townships and natural causes—that is, the existence of rivers, lakes, etc., within the granted section. The basis of this claim is an affidavit (Exhibit No. 9) filed by Thomas G. Riley, agent of the State, showing the reason for the failure to file proper lists. A careful investigation of this claim leads us to believe that it is just. Besides, the State has had only 2,345.37 acres of land of this character heretofore patented. (See also Exhibit No. 8.)

3. The sum of $148,450, the same being for 118,760 acres of land (Exhibit No. 4), listed and filed upon the showing made in the field notes of the public surveys that the land therein described was swamp and overflowed, and therefore passed to the State by the act of September 28, 1850, and thereafter sold by the United States prior to March 3, 1857, thus using the same as a basis for cash indemnity under the act of March 3, 1857, at $1.25 per acre.

13. The sum of $348,544.06, the same being for 278,835.248 acres of swamp lands in place and as a basis of land and cash indemnity at $1.25 per acre. This sum is made up by the allowance of about one-fourth of the amount claimed by the State through its agent, Thomas G. Riley, who has listed 506,260 acres of lands, the same not yet being filed in the swamp division. Mr. Riley states in his affidavit (see Exhibit No. 10) that he has not yet finished the examination of the field notes of the State, and that it is his opinion, from a careful estimate of the amount and character of the lands in the State, the field notes of which he has not yet examined, that there remained, over and above said lists of 506,260 acres, other swamp lands never yet listed or applied for to the amount of 400,000 acres, including about 50,000 acres of what are known as "sunk lands," heavily timbered, and not yet surveyed. This claim of 906,260 acres, not having been formally asked for by filing the lists in the proper division, we are not prepared to admit, as a whole; but, on a careful examination into the merits of the same for the purpose of an equitable adjustment of the whole swamp-land claims of the State, we recommend, as above shown, the allowance of the claim to the extent above mentioned.

LAND CLAIMS ADJUSTED AND ADMITTED.

6. The sum of $8,964.25, the same being for 1,792.85 acres of indemnity school land (Exhibit No. 8) at $5 per acre, a list of which has been filed and officially reported as "apparently valid."

7. The sum of $800, the same being for 160 acres of land at $5 per acre (Exhibit 8, Table 3), being the residue of the grant under the act of June 15, 1832, entitled "Court-house and jail grant."

8. The sum of $554.85, the same being for 110.97 acres of land at $5 per acre (Exhibit 8, Table 3), being the residue of the lands granted by the act of September 4, 1841, for internal improvements.

9. The sum of $31,116.55, being for 6,223.31 acres of land at $5 per acre (Exhibit 8, Table 3), being the residue of the seminary lands due the State under section 5, act of June 23, 1836.

10. The sum of $80.05, being for 16.01 acres of land at $5 per acre (Exhibit 8, Table 3), the same being the residue of lands due the State under the act of March 2, 1831, for the erection of public buildings.

11. The sum of $255.65, the same being for 51.13 acres of land at $5 per acre (Exhibit 8, Table 3), being the residue of land granted under section 4, act of June 30, 1836, for the completion of public buildings.

12. The sum of $19,200, the same being for 3,840 acres of Salt Spring lands at $5 per acre (Exhibit 8, Table 3), being six sections not yet certified to the State under section 2 of the act of June 23, 1836.

According to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the year ending June 30, 1894, there have been patented to the State of Arkansas 7,673,565.16 acres of swamp lands.

Arkansas is one of the States which elected to take its swamp lands upon the evidences contained in the field notes of the public survey. A very large part of the State was surveyed prior to the date of the swamp-land grant (September 28, 1850), and without reference thereto; it results therefrom that the surveys do not always accurately indicate the character of the lands, as do the surveys made subsequent to the date of its passage.

Many of the States have received large sums of cash and land indemnity under the acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857; these sums were paid under the terms of said acts on satisfactory proof being made by the State that the Government had sold lands which passed to the States under the swamp-land act. Illinois and Iowa have each received over $500,000 of such indemnity; other States received smaller sums, but Arkansas has never received any amount either of cash or land indemnity under these acts.

This may be in part accounted for on the ground that the sales and locations of swamp lands in Arkansas prior to March 3, 1857, were less than in other States which received generous amounts of cash and land indemnity. Again, the amount of swamp lands certified to the State, while vastly less than the amount asked for, is still greatly in excess of Illinois, Iowa, and other States receiving large indemnity.

Making these credits against the debit side of the account leaves $160,572 balance due from the State, which we recommend that the State meet by protecting 160 of her 252 new bonds—$1,000 each, and paying $572 within thirty days after the approval of this compromise; and we have prepared and herewith submit an agreement carrying into effect the provisions of this compromise, when duly signed by you and the governor of Arkansas and approved by Congress.

We have faithfully endeavored to arrive at a just and equitable settlement of the long-standing differences between the United States and the State of Arkansas. The time at our disposal was necessarily limited, but we believe the foregoing explanations will serve to make clear the basis of the proposed settlement.

Respectfully submitted.

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

We, the undersigned, members of the Committee on the Public Lands, feel constrained to dissent from the report of the majority of the committee on the bill H. R. 8944. We regret to do this, because we have not had an opportunity nor the time to give the matter such an examination as its importance demands. More than $2,000,000 are involved in the settlement, including the interest, and it requires an investigation of the transactions between the State and General Government from the time of the admission of the State into the Union. It would seem that as important a matter as this should be examined with due care by the committee. Congress only authorized a conditional settlement, which should have no binding effect until approved by Congress.

This reservation was put in the act in order that the proper committees and Congress might give the transaction a suitable and full examination. We have had no time to do this, as the matter was first heard in the committee on the 27th of February, 1895, with only three days remaining of the session of Congress; but from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Secretary of the Interior and the accompanying statement of certain experts it does seem to us that the settlement is not a just one to the General Government.

The Government held the bonds of Arkansas for large amounts. These bonds were held as trust funds, and must be made good by the United States. In making this settlement the interest is computed upon the bonds only to the date of maturity. A very large number of them matured in 1861. The settlement gives away thirty-four years' interest on these obligations. Under this contract these bonds are to be treated as paid because of the fact that the United States Government has sold land claimed to be swamp lands, which sales were made many years ago at the Government price of $1.25 per acre, and a large part was given to settlers as homesteads for nothing. The contract assumes that the State is now entitled to select other public lands in lieu thereof, and that the said lands should now be worth $5 per acre. Thus, by stopping the interest on the bonds and computing that the value of the lands have increased fourfold the rights of the Government have been cut off both ways.

The report shows that 7,673,565.16 acres of swamp land have all been patented to the State, amounting to nearly 12,000 square miles. The enormous quantity of lands thus patented as swamp lands would indicate that Arkansas has not been unjustly dealt with in the certification of such lands, but owing to the shortness of the time given to consider the matter it is impossible for us to examine the question from the records. The State claims that there are 906,260 acres of additional swamp land listed and unlisted. This claim is lumped off at 278,835 acres at $1.25 per acre. We are not prepared to say that a careful examination of the whole matter might not show that the settlement in some respects would be equitable in view of circumstances not brought to the notice of the committee, but in the light of what has been shown to the committee the settlement is certainly a one-sided affair, in which the interests of the General Government have not been suitably guarded.

This matter has been pending for twenty-five years. The settlement only gives the Government $572 in money and allows it to retain $160,000 of the bonds it now holds against the State. No great harm could befall the State if a settlement of this kind should be left open long enough so that it might be fully examined by committees and Congress. The act authorizing settlement was only tentative, intended as giving facts and figures from which Congress might act. Burton T. Doyle and George C. Ross, experts, seem also to have been very much hurried in making their examinations, and they state in the report that the "time at our disposal was necessarily limited." The committee did not even have an opportunity to confer with these experts. This may be readily understood when we observe that the contract we are asked to railroad through in the expiring hours of the session was only executed on the 23d day of February, 1895.

There should be no disposition to hasten this matter to final action without at least reasonably fair consideration by the committee, which has not been able to give the matter such consideration. It was referred to a subcommittee, but the subcommittee did not have time to make any examination of the matter or make a report. There is another feature in the contract that is somewhat singular, and will no doubt result in a demand of additional legislation in favor of other States. The contract assumes that the sixteenth sections of land given for school purposes have fallen short on account of ponds and streams to the amount estimated roughly at 30,000 acres. This is credited at $5 instead of $1.25 an acre. We are not referred to any precedent for thus estimating shortages in these sixteenth-section grants. The seminary matter of 6,223 acres and the salt-springs item of 3,840 acres, both credited at $5 per acre, have not been explained, and are not understood by the committee.

If the Government buys back these lands at $5 per acre from the State, they will be immediately opened to homestead settlement and given away to settlers. If these lands were improperly sold they certainly ought not to be allowed at more than the Government price of $1.25 an acre.

Mr. MCRAE made the report on H. R. 4903, upon which this settlement is based, December 20, 1893. He uses the following language:

"From the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office it appears that the United States have sold 200,750 acres of such land for the sum of $196,990, and disposed of, for land warrants, scrip, and homestead, 162,080 acres, worth, at $1.25 per acre, the sum of $202,600. The State claims that she should be credited with the sums so received, as of the years in which the sales were made, and allowed $1.25 per acre for such lands as were otherwise disposed of, making a total claim on this account of $399,590."

From this it appears that the State only claimed $1.25 an acre then, instead of $5 an acre as allowed by the Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of the Interior.

The agreement also is faulty in this, that it may subject the Government to the necessity of making good the titles of land held by third parties which the State reserves the right to assail in the courts. Purchasers of these lands may be subjected to much annoyance, litigation, and loss by reason of this provision of the contract.

The settlement reserves the right of the State to attack the titles of settlers and purchasers of these lands, as will be seen from the following paragraph in the agreement:

"Nothing in this settlement and agreement is intended to or shall in any connection be held to prejudice the right of the State of Arkansas to assert and establish her title to any lands which were granted or confirmed to her by the said acts approved September 28, 1850, March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, in so far as the same is disputed by those claiming under any subsequent grant made or claimed to have been made, the scope and purpose of this settlement being hereby declared to be the adjustment of all disputes between the United States and the State of Arkansas, and to leave undisturbed incidental controversies between said State and other parties in which the United States is not beneficially interested."

As to the opinion of the Attorney-General, holding that interest ceases at maturity, no copy was presented to the committee, and we do not know on what grounds he bases it.

Certainly if no interest on the bonds is to be allowed, the Government should not be compelled to pay $5 an acre for land which it gave to homesteaders or sold only at $1.25 an acre.

No action on this bill should be taken without at least reasonable consideration, which is impossible at this late day in the session.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 17, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 6th ultimo requesting a "statement of the several claims of the State of Arkansas now of record and remaining unadjusted," with view to compromise and settlement under act approved August 4, 1894.

In response thereto I herewith transmit statements showing the status of the several claims, adjusted and unadjusted, in favor of said State of Arkansas, as follows:

Five per cent fund account.—There has accrued to the State of Arkansas from July 1, 1836, to June 30, 1893, the sum of $264,553.70 on account of the 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the sales of public land, of which amount the State has been paid $59,770.84 for making canals and roads, $162,902.31 retained by the United States to pay interest on State bonds held in trust for the benefit of the Smithsonian Institution, $40,080.55 to pay interest on bonds held in trust for benefit of Chickasaw Indians, and $1,800 withheld for benefit of Chickasaw orphans, making a total of—

Amount paid the State	$59,770.84
Amount withheld by United States	204,782.86
Total	264,553.70

as fully set forth in exhibit marked A.

There is due the State of Arkansas the sum of $325.74 on account of 5 per cent of net proceeds of sales of public lands during the fiscal year 1894, statement of which was sent to Treasury Department on 14th instant.

I would respectfully call attention to the adjustment of the account between the United States and the State of Arkansas, made July 1, 1881 (Report No. 32485), for the 5 per cent of the net proceeds of sales of public land from January 1, 1862, to June 30, 1880, which shows a balance due said State of $485.41.

In said adjustment the entire expenses of local land offices, amounting to $75,744.96, together with repayments of purchase money for land erroneously sold and fees and commissions erroneously paid, amounting to $13,823.28 during that period of over eighteen years, were deducted from total cash sales, whereas under the method of adjusting such accounts which has prevailed since that date (July 1, 1881), of prorating the expenses between total cash sales and total receipts from fees and commissions, the State would be entitled to some $2,000 or $2,500 more than found to be due by the above-mentioned Report No. 32485.

Distribution act, September 4, 1841.—There was found to be due the State of Arkansas under this act the sums of $4,482.79 and $529.37, making a total of $5,012.16, which amount was withheld by the United States and applied in part payment of interest on $538,000 6 per cent State bonds held in trust by the Treasurer of the United States for the Smithsonian Institution.

Railroad grants.—The only grants by Congress to the State of Arkansas this office is charged with the administration of are the grants of lands to aid in the construction of the railroads now known as the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern, the Little Rock and Memphis, and the Little Rock and Fort Smith railroads.

These grants were made by the act of February 9, 1853 (10 Stat., 159), and were revived and extended by the act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stat., 1866). The State conferred said grants upon three different corporations organized under its laws, for the purpose of securing the construction of the roads.

The roads were completed within the time prescribed by the law and the lands granted were thus earned; and it has always been the practice of this office, with the approval of the Department, to certify said lands to the State for the benefit of the company earning them. The companies to which the State transferred the grant are the beneficiaries, and the State is simply the trustee, deriving no benefit from the grants other than that resulting from the increased facilities for transportation.

The act of July 28, 1866, which revived and extended the grant of 1853, expressly declared that "all the lands therein granted which reverted to the United States under the provisions of said act be, and the same are hereby, restored to the same custody, control, and condition, and made subject to the uses and trusts in all respects as they were before and at the time such reversion took effect." The State, therefore, has no pecuniary interest in the lands granted to aid in the construction of these roads.

The grant for the Little Rock and Fort Smith road was reported by this office to the Department on November 12, 1889, as finally adjusted, but the Department has not yet passed upon the matter. The two remaining grants have not been finally adjusted.

Grants in aid of education and for other purposes.—Statement showing the status of the claim of the State of Arkansas, under its State grants, remaining unsettled on November 8, 1894.

In regard to the grant for internal improvements, the Commissioner's Report for the fiscal year 1850-51, page 8, shows the status of the grant at that time to have been as follows:

	Acres.
Amount granted	500,000.00
Amount approved	499,889.03
Deficit	110.97

In regard to the seminary grant, by letter to Paul M. Cobb, commissioner of State lands, dated February 28, 1885, volume 22, press copy, page 103, it was stated that the State was still entitled to select an amount not exceeding 6,223.31 acres in satisfaction of said grant. It does not appear that any selections have been made in view of the above statement, and it is probable that the State is still entitled to the above amount under the grant for a seminary.

To verify these statements from the records would, I should say, take the time of an expert accountant for two or three weeks, the records being so faulty.

In regard to the amount of lieu land (sections 16) disposed of by the United States, the only way of ascertaining that fact would be to go through all the tract books, examine the sixteenth sections for any entries that may be shown, and also as to whether the State has selected indemnity for such entries, should any be found. This would be a work of weeks, if not months.

There is one list of school indemnity selections by the State of Arkansas on file, remaining unadjusted, embracing in the aggregate 2,074.55 acres, which appears to be valid and free from objection, except as to 280 acres, in which the basis has already been satisfied.

Considering the deficit in the internal-improvement grant of 110.97 acres, deficit in the seminary grant, 6,223.31 acres, and the unadjusted list of school indemnity selections, 2,074.55 acres, the entire amount which the records show the State may claim under the several grants is 8,408.83 acres.

In the absence of a specific statement showing what is claimed by the State, the above is the best statement that can be made without a full review of all the selections under each grant made since the admission of the State into the Union in 1836.

Claim under the swamp-land laws.—By the swamp-land grant of September 28, 1850 (9 U. S. Stat., 519), all the swamp lands then existing and not already disposed of in Arkansas were granted to the said State. The quantity granted is indefinite, since no other designation of the lands was given in the law than "swamp and overflowed lands."

By the confirmatory act of March 3, 1857 (11 U. S. Stat., 251), the claim to all lands reported on that date to the General Land Office, under the swamp-land grant, was confirmed to the State as swamp lands, whether they were of such character or not.

By the indemnity sections of the acts of March 2, 1855 (10 U. S. Stat., 634), and March 3, 1857 (11 U. S. Stat., 251), the State was granted cash and land indemnity in lieu of swamp lands granted, but sold to individuals, up to the date of the passage of the said acts. No indemnity is authorized by law for swamp lands sold by the United States after the date of the passage of the confirmatory act of March 3, 1857.

There has been selected or claimed for or by the State under the swamp-land grant 8,656,372.39 acres, and of this quantity 7,673,565.16 acres have been patented as swamp lands. (Report of Commissioner General Land Office for 1894.)

There remains unsettled on the selection records of the division of swamp lands of this office a claim representing about 626,160 acres, as shown by a tabulated statement, with descriptive exhibits corresponding with the columns in the statement herewith submitted.

Exhibit No. 1 shows the lands approved to the State and which might be patented at this time but for the passage of the act approved August 4, 1894, entitled "An act to authorize a compromise and settlement with the State of Arkansas."

Exhibit No. 2 shows lands reported to the General Land Office prior to March 3, 1857, and which are, therefore, confirmed to the State. But for the act of August 4, 1894, these lands might be approved and patented.

Exhibit No. 3 shows lands reported or selected subsequent to March 3, 1857, and which are subject to adjustment. The claim of the State to a number of the tracts is in conflict with the claims of individuals, who contest the allegation that the lands are swamp lands in fact. The claim of the State to other tracts is not contested. The material question as to whether these lands are swamp lands or not has not as yet been determined.

Exhibit No. 4 shows lands disposed of to individuals, under locations made under the general land laws, between the dates of September 28, 1850, and March 3, 1857. If due proof is made by the State that the lands were in fact swamp lands at the date of the grant, the State will receive certificates authorizing it to locate an equal acreage of agricultural lands in lieu of the swamp land proved to have been lost.

The exhibit also shows the claim of the State for cash indemnity, where the lands were entered by individuals under cash purchases.

Exhibit No. 5 shows lands to which the State can assert no legitimate claim, since the lands had already been disposed of at the date of the grant and were, therefore, excepted from the provisions of the grant. But for the suspension of settlements by reason of the act of August 4, 1894, the improper claim of record might be rejected.

Exhibit No. 6 shows lands claimed by the State as swamp lands, and by railroads, claiming under the State, as nonswamp lands. Having been approved and certified to the State under one grant it can not properly assert a claim to the same lands under another grant. (See State of Arkansas vs. St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, 10 L. D., 165.) The claim of the State on the basis of these lands might also be rejected but for the act of August 4, 1894.

Exhibit No. 7 shows lands the title to which passed to individuals subsequent to the indemnity period. The lands being patented to individuals, they can not be also patented to the State; and having been sold after the indemnity period, they can not under the law be made the subject of an indemnity claim. Hence they are classified as "unadjustable," under existing laws.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, D. C., ss:

Thomas G. Riley, on his oath, being duly sworn, makes the following statement:

I was appointed by the governor of the State of Arkansas in February, 1886, to look after the interests of the State of Arkansas growing out of the swamp-land act of September 28, 1850, and was afterwards directed to look after the claim of said State for indemnity school lands.

Since the date of my appointment I have continuously resided in Washington, D. C., and have had, through the courtesy of the several Commissioners of the General Land Office, access to the tract books of the General Land Office.

To carry out the purposes of my designation as the agent of the State, I have examined said books with a view to determine the amount of cash indemnity and land indemnity due the State under the act of March 3, 1857; also to ascertain from the field notes the residue of swamp lands in place due the State under the act of September 28, 1850.

In addition to these duties as agent of said State I have ascertained the amount of school indemnity due the State by reason of the losses in the granted section (16) on account of fractional townships, and other losses to said section growing out of natural causes, i. e., the existence of rivers, lakes, etc., the meandering of which by the public survey lessened to that extent the amount of school lands allowed by law.

I have filed but one list for indemnity school lands, that of December 10, 1890, for 2,073.85 acres, of which amount 1,792.85 acres are held to be "apparently valid," though not yet approved.

In addition to this list I have prepared, since the year 1890, four other lists of indemnity school lands from bases above described. I am positive the bases of these selections were valid. I took these lists to Division "K" of the General Land Office for the purpose of filing, but was there advised that they could not be accepted by reason of an informality—namely, there were no nonmineral affidavits accompanying said lists. These lists were then returned to the governor of Arkansas for the purpose of securing the requisite affidavits. The lists have not yet been returned for filing. The lands selected in these four lists amounted to 30,000 acres, and the bases for the selections were valid.

THOMAS G. RILEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 16th day of January, 1895.

[SEAL.] WM. H. DE LACY, Notary Public.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington, D. C., ss:

Thomas G. Riley, on oath, being duly sworn, makes the following statement:

That he was appointed by the governor of Arkansas, in March, 1886, to examine the records, files, tract books, and plat books of the General Land Office for the purpose of determining therefrom the amount of swamp lands in place due the State under the act of September 28, 1850; also the indemnity due the State under the acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857; that in pursuance of these duties he has from time to time filed various lists, which have been in part acted upon by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

That he has prepared lists embracing 506,000 acres of land not heretofore selected, and which have not been, but are now ready to be, filed in the General Land Office; that from a careful and painstaking examination of the field notes of survey, for each 40-acre tract embraced in said lists, he believes that the greater portion of each 40-acre tract included in said list is swamp and overflowed land within the meaning of the swamp-land act.

That he believes the State entitled to all said lands or indemnity therefor.

That he has not yet finished the examination of the field notes of the State, and it is his opinion, from a careful eestimate of the amount and character of the lands in the State, the field notes of which he has not yet examined, that there remains over and above said lists of 506,000 acres, other swamp lands to the amount of 400,000 acres. This will include about 50,000 acres of what are known as "sunk lands," heavily timbered and not yet surveyed.

THOS. G. RILEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 15th day of February, 1895.

APPENDIX B.

SETTLERS' RIGHTS AND SWAMP-LAND GRANTS.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A bill (H. R. 7028) to protect settlers' rights where two or more persons settled upon the same subdivision of agricultural public lands before survey thereof, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the statement of the conferees.

The statement was read, as follows:

"1. The effect of the first amendment is to protect the rights of contests under section 1 of this act, initiated prior to its passage, and to allow all qualified persons who have subsisting timber-culture entries, and who have for at least eight years (the period required by that old timber-culture act) in good faith endeavored to comply with the law as to breaking the ground, planting the seeds, and cultivating the trees, to prove up and get title upon the payment of the fees required in homestead entries, without regard to whether the trees have been made to grow or not.

"The provision relating to persons who have in good faith initiated claims upon public lands, which may be afterwards selected and withdrawn for reservoir sites, is not changed by the conference committee. It provides that patent may issue containing a reservation in favor of the United States, reserving the right to use so much of the land as may be necessary for the construction of a reservoir thereon, and also provides for hearings to determine whether or not such lands should be reserved for such purposes. This will afford additional protection to the rights of settlers in good faith upon lands which have been or may be selected for reservoir purposes, and is not inconsistent with the purposes to be subserved by existing laws upon the subject.

"2. The twenty-fourth section of the act of March 3, 1891, authorized the President of the United States to reserve public timber lands from sale and disposal, and to set them aside for forestry purposes.

"About 10,000,000 acres have been preserved, presumably to protect the growth from destruction by fire and ax, and the preservation of forest conditions, upon which water conditions and water flow are said to be dependent. Under the second amendment of the Senate, as amended by the conference report, it is provided that, if, after examination, it shall be found to be better ada ted to agricultural than forest uses, it may be restored to the public domain upon sixty days' notice in two newspapers. The Secretary of the Interior, with the cooperation of the Secretary of War, is required to protect the reservations against fire and depredations, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make rules and regulations for the occupancy and utilization of said reservations. The purpose of this is to make proper provision for the administration and protection of the reservations created and to be hereafter created.

"3. The third amendment provides:

"(1) For the final and complete adjustment of the swamp-land grant upon the basis recommended by the Department of the Interior. It allows indemnity only for swamp land erroneously sold or located by warrant or scrip after relinquishment and waiver in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. For lands sold the purchase money to the amount of $1.25 per acre is allowed, and for those erroneously located by warrant or scrip the price of the land at the date of location, not exceeding $1.25 per acre. It is in effect an extension of the act of March 2, 1855, as construed by the Department, except that cash indemnity of $1.25 per acre is allowed for lands located by warrants or scrip instead of nonswamp land subject to entry at that price.

"That act was passed before the passage of the homestead law. The change in this respect is in obedience to the policy of the Government to reserve the public lands for actual settlers under the homestead law. This amendment does not confirm the selections heretofore made and reported, as did the said act of March 3, 1857. It excludes all evidence of the character of the lands except the field notes of the Government survey in those States which elected to make them the basis of settlement. The other States are required to deposit in all cases, and to pay in those cases where the claim is rejected, the cost of the investigation into the character of any tract claimed by the State as swamp land. The illegal selections under the old act can be disposed of if the cost is not deposited in ninety days after notice, and no new claims will be examined until such deposit is made. The Secretary is given full power to determine what shall be satisfactory and sufficient evidence as to the character of the land at the time of the grant, and to investigate and reject any fraudulent returns of Government surveys.

"Agents and inspectors of the Department are authorized to administer oaths and take affidavits of witnesses. All claims under this act and prior acts are barred unless presented within one year from the passage of this act. A limitation upon the amount to be paid for lands sold and located since March 3, 1857, is fixed, but no appropriation is made, and no money can be paid to any State until the claim of each State under the swamp-land grant and under this act has been fully adjusted. Counties, parishes, districts, and individuals are not recognized as possessing the right to prosecute claims. This right is restricted to the States to which the original grants were made. It is not probable that the sum fixed will be required for the adjustment of claims since March 3, 1857. The valid claims of nearly all the States prior to that date have been allowed, but the examination of those pending will require a large amount of labor and money under existing law, which will be saved if the pending measure becomes a law.

"(2) The State of Arkansas owes the United States in all the sum of $625,000 principal on bonds past due. In addition to this the Treasurer of the United States holds for the Secretary of the Interior, trustee of the Indian trust fund, $168,000 worth of bonds, redeemable January 1, 1900. The State claims against the United States the sum of $679,548.51, which has accrued from time to time, and nearly a million acres of land selected under the act of March 3, 1857. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion to make a full and final compromise with the State.

"(3) The provision in relation to soldiers' additional homestead entries has been changed by the conference committee so as to make it conform to the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. In some cases certificates were erroneously issued by the Department. In such cases the soldier may have entered land and disposed of his right thereto to innocent purchasers, who relied upon the certificates of right issued by the Department. The circular of February 1, 1883, discontinued the practice of certifying to the additional right, but did not apply to applications then pending or that might be filed in the Land Office prior to March 16, 1883. Consequently there were some certificates issued after the latter date. The lands which the outstanding certificates cover it is estimated would approximate 10,000 acres. The Commissioner of the General Land Office in his letter of February 25, 1893, says:

"'It has come to the knowledge of this office that a number of these certificates have been transferred, and locations made thereunder by parties who purchased them in good faith, and I think that this class of purchasers should be protected and that patent should issue to them and for their benefit.'

"4. The provision in relation to contests will change the present law so as to prevent personal contests after final entry, but it does not interfere with the right of the Government to cancel or hold for cancellation any entry for fraud on the part of the entryman. The purpose of this amendment is to protect bona fide settlers from blackmailing and speculative contests.

"THO. C. MCRAE.
"JOHN O. PENDLETON.
"J. A. PICKLER."

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas has the floor on a question of the highest privilege—a conference report.

Mr. TRACEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TRACEY. Would it be in order to raise the question of consideration on this report?

Several MEMBERS. It is too late.

Mr. MCREA. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is too late to raise a question of consideration after the House has entered upon the consideration.

The SPEAKER. It is not too late until the papers are read, because the House would not know what it was until they are read.

Mr. TRACEY. I desire to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to gentlemen that, for the purpose of facilitating the adjustment of the other bills, it would be far better to take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. MCRAE. I have no objection to a recess now, if it will be understood that we have entered upon the consideration of this bill, and that it will come up after the recess. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York [Mr. Tracey] to raise the question of consideration.

Mr. TRACEY. I did.

Mr. MCRAE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I hope that we will settle that question before we take a recess.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that we take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question. The question is whether the House will——

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield for a moment for a conference report which requires no debate?

The SPEAKER. This is a conference report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is better to take a recess now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] calls up the conference report which has just been read, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Tracey] raises the question of consideration on the report, and the question for the House to determine is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of this conference report?

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not my motion in order to take a recess?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, pending this motion.

Mr. MCRAE. As there seems to be a disposition on the part of gentlemen to take a recess, I shall not insist on action upon the question of consideration at this time if it is agreed that all my rights are reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration is not debatable.

Mr. MCRAE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to taking a recess, with the understanding that the status of the bill shall remain as it is now. I do not want to keep members from their dinner.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] presents a conference report, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Tracey] raises the question of consideration upon it. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock. If the House takes that recess the exact status that now exists as to this matter will obtain then. The question of consideration will be before the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to reserve all points of order in reference to this report.

Mr. MCRAE. If the House votes to consider the report, that should settle any points of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] calls up a conference report. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Tracey] raises the question of consideration, and pending that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] moves that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to take me off the floor when I have raised the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is off the floor as soon as he makes the motion, because the question of consideration is not debatable.

Mr. TRACEY. But I understood the Chair to say that the question of consideration must be put. Now, there has been no change in the situation since the Chair made that announcement.

The SPEAKER. The only question is whether, pending a conference report, the House may adjourn or take a recess. The Chair is inclined to think that the House has a right to do that, but will examine the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to taking a recess now. It will leave the situation unchanged.

The SPEAKER. Whilst the rule accords to gentlemen the right to present conference reports at any time, the Chair sees nothing in the rules that would prevent the Chair from entertaining either a motion to adjourn or a motion to take a recess pending the report. The question, therefore, is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I desire to say on behalf of my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, Governor SAYERS, that he has been absent during this legislative day on committees of conference, and for that reason I ask that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The rules excuse the gentleman when he is absent on the business of the House.

The motion of Mr. Holman was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the Speaker called the House to order at 8 p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—PROTECTION OF SETTLEMENT RIGHTS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7028) to protect settlement rights where two or more persons settle upon the same subdivision of agricultural public lands before survey thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. Upon this conference report the gentleman from New York [Mr. Tracey] raises the question of consideration, and the question is, Will the House proceed to consider the report?

The question was taken: and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 11.

Mr. TRACEY. No quorum.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. That is the shortest way of settling this matter. I hope the friends of this measure will stand by it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 59, not voting 139; as follows:

So the House decided to consider the conference report.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. Tarsney with Mr. Henderson of Illinois.

For the rest of the day:

Mr. Lanham with Mr. Taylor of Tennessee.

Mr. Compton with Mr. Lodge.

Mr. Causey with Mr. Haynes.

Mr. Rayner with Mr. Caldwell.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The House has decided to proceed with the consideration of this report.

Mr. TRACEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Tracey] will suspend a moment until a report can be presented from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

SETTLEMENT OF AGRICULTURAL PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. TRACEY. I wish to reserve points of order on the bill which the House has just decided to consider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair in the confusion has difficulty in hearing the gentleman.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to raise a point of order against portions of this conference report. I wish to state before the report has been read that I reserve all points of order against the report.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, and then the gentleman can make any point of order that may be proper to be made. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. TRACEY. If in order, it will very much clear the atmosphere surrounding this rather peculiar conference report to have the bill read and the Senate amendments thereto, so that the House may have a clear understanding of the matter that is about to come before it. I ask to have that done.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first read the bill as it passed the House, then the amendments of the Senate, and then the conference report.

Mr. TRACEY. I will ask for order during the reading. I think this is a matter of very considerable importance which members of the House would much desire to hear and understand.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

The bill as passed by the House was read, as follows:

"A bill (H. R. 7028) to protect settlement rights where two or more persons settle upon the same subdivision of agricultural public lands before survey thereof.

"Be it enacted, etc., That where settlements have heretofore or hereafter been made upon agricultural public lands of the United States prior to the survey thereof, and it has been or shall be ascertained, after the public surveys have been extended over such lands, that two or more settlers have improvements upon the same legal subdivision, it shall be lawful for such settlers to make joint cash entry of their lands at the local land office, or for either of said settlers to enter into contract with his co-settlers to convey to them their portion of said land after patent is issued to him, and after making said contract to make homestead entry in his own name, and prove up and pay for said land; and proof of joint occupation by himself and others, and of such contract with them made, shall be equivalent to proof of sale, occupation, and homestead entry by the applicant: Provided, That in no case shall the amount patented under this act exceed 160 acres, nor shall this act apply to lands not subject to homestead entry."

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

"After line 19 insert the following:

"'SEC. 2. That an act entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following provision: "And provided further, That any person who has made entry of any public lands of the United States under the timber-culture laws, and who has heretofore for a period of eight years in good faith attempted to comply with the provisions of said laws, and who at the time of making the entry was a bona fide resident of the State or Territory in which said land is located, or residing within five miles of the boundary line of such State or Territory, and where there was no pending contest on March 3, 1891, shall be entitled to make final proof thereto and acquire title to the same by payment of the customary fee for final proofs in homestead entries: Provided, That any person who has made entry upon any public lands of the United States under the timber-culture laws, and who has for a period of four years in good faith complied with the provisions of said laws, shall be entitled to make final proof thereto and acquire title to the same by the payment of $1.25 per acre for such tract, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and registers and receivers shall be allowed the same fees and compensation for final proofs in timber-culture entries as are now allowed by law in homestead entries."

"'That section 24 of an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, be amended by adding thereto the following words: "And he may, when deemed expedient, vacate any such reservation or any portion thereof, and by like proclamation restore the same to the public domain, subject to disposition under the land laws of the United States."

"'That whenever any person has initiated, in good faith, by settlement or otherwise, a claim to any of the public lands of the United States which shall afterwards be selected and withdrawn as a permanent site for a reservoir under any act of Congress, said person so initiating said claim may nevertheless make final proof and payment for said land and receive a patent therefor: Provided, however, That in all such cases the patent issued to such person shall contain a reservation in favor of the United States without any claim for cost or damages of any kind against the United States, its grantees or assigns, reserving the right to use so much of said land as may be found necessary for the purpose of constructing a reservoir or reservoirs thereon,

"'That whenever any settler upon lands which have been selected for reservoir sites under any act of Congress shall file in any United States land office an affidavit, corroborated by at least two witnesses residing in the vicinity of the land, setting forth that the lands so selected as aforesaid are not suitable for reservoir purposes, and can not be used for such purposes practicably, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall order a hearing to be held to determine whether it is practicable to permanently reserve the said lands for the purposes contemplated by law, which said hearing shall be held as other hearings ordered by the Commissioner are held, and should it be finally determined in favor of the settler the land settled upon shall be held subject to entry by him in accordance with the settlement laws for thirty days from notice of the decision which shall be given him by the land officers for the proper land district.

"'That the agents appointed by the Department of the Interior to investigate claims under the swamp-land act, approved September 28, 1850, shall have the power to administer oaths and to compel the attendance of witnesses both on behalf of the State and of the United States, and witnesses swearing falsely before them shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction, be punished as now prescribed by law.

"'SEC. 3. That where soldiers' additional homestead entries have been made or initiated upon certificate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the right to make such entry, and there is no adverse claimant, and such certificate is found erroneous or invalid for any cause, the purchaser thereunder, on making proof of such purchase, may perfect his title by payment of the Government price for the land. And nothing herein contained shall prevent the location of soldiers' homestead certificates heretofore issued under the rules and regulations of the General Land Office under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and patent shall issue therefor in the name of the locator, and issued and transferred in good faith prior to March 16, 1883.'

"Amend title so as to read:

"'To protect settlement rights where two or more persons settled upon the same subdivision of agricultural public lands before survey thereof, and for other purposes.'"

The SPEAKER (before the reading was concluded). The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] will give his attention. The title as it occurs in these amendments does not appear to be the same as the title of the House bill.

Mr. TRACEY. That is one of the points which will appear later on. The title has been materially changed.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

'The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7028) entitled "An act to protect settlement rights where two or more persons settle upon the same subdivision of agricultural public lands before survey thereof," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

"That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same amended as follows:

"'In line 4 of said Senate amendments, after the word "provision," strike out the words "And provided further, That any person who has made entry of any public lands of the United States under the timber-culture laws, and who has heretofore for a period of eight years in good faith attempted to comply with the provisions of said laws, and who at the time of making the entry was a bona fide resident of the State or Territory in which said land is located, or residing within 5 miles of the boundary line of such State or Territory, and where there was no pending contest on March 3, 1891, shall be entitled to make final proof thereto and acquire title to the same, by payment of the customary fee for final proofs in homestead entries," and insert—

"SEC. —. That section 1 shall not be construed so as to interfere with any valid right or contest initiated prior to the passage of this act: And provided further, That any person qualified to make entry, and who has a subsisting entry under the timber-culture laws, and who has for at least eight years in good faith attempted to comply with the provisions of said laws, shall be entitled to make final proof, upon the payment of the fees required in homestead entry, and such attempt in good faith to comply with said laws shall be construed to entitle the entry man to all the benefits of said timber-culture laws and amendments thereto, and in computing the time before final proof under said timber-culture laws and acts amendatory thereof the same shall commence at date of entry."

"Strike out lines 27 to 33 inclusive and insert:

"'SEC. —. That any public lands embraced within the limits of any forest reservation made under section 24 of the act approved March 3, 1891, which after the examination shall be found better adapted to agricultural than forest uses, may be restored to the public domain upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, after sixty days' public notice in two newspapers of general circulation in the State where the reservation is situated.

"'SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior, with the assistance and cooperation of the Secretary of War, shall make provision for the protection against fire and depredations of the forest reservations, and the Secretary of the Interior shall make such proper rules and regulations for the occupancy and utilization of said reservations as will preserve the forest cover from destruction and insure the objects of the reservations.'

"Strike out lines 62 to 69, inclusive, of the second amendment of the Senate and all of the third amendment of the Senate, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"'SEC. —. That the proper officers of the Department of the Interior and of the Treasury shall finally adjust and settle the claims of any State against the United States for all lands which have been sold or located by warrant or scrip that were included in any grant of swamp and overflowed lands, and in such settlement and adjustment such State shall, upon filing proper relinquishment and waiver to the land in place, in the manner to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be allowed, credited, and paid the purchase money to the amount of $1.25 per acre for all such lands situated therein as have been erroneously located by warrant or scrip therein, the amount of indemnity to be limited to the price at which the lands were held at the date of location, but not to exceed $1.25 per acre: Provided, That all claims for land or indemnity under any of the swamp-land laws or under this act shall be forever barred for lands now surveyed, unless presented to the Secretary of the Interior within one year from the passage of this act, and for lands unsurveyed, unless presented within one year after the filing in proper local land office of a copy of the officially approved township plat of the survey of the township in which said lands may be situated: Provided further, That under no circumstances shall more than $2,000,000 be paid under the provisions of this act for lands sold or located by warrant or scrip since March 3, 1857, and no money shall be paid to any State until the claim of each State under the swamp-land grant and under this act has been adjusted, so far as the surveyed land in each State will permit of such adjustment; and should the claims of the various States amount to more than the said $2,000,000, the claims shall be settled by the payment of said sum pro rata among the States, according to the number of acres each State is found to be entitled to under said adjustment.

"'SEC. —. That in those States which elected to make the field notes of the United States Government survey the basis for determining what lands passed to them under the swamp grant, together with the State of California, the State will not be permitted to offer any other evidence in support of any claim to any tract of land as swamp, but said field notes shall be final in determining the character of the land; and in those States where evidence is to be taken as to the character of the land the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall notify the governor of the State of the amount of estimated cost of the investigation into the character of any tract or tracts of land claimed by the State as swamp, and request that said amount be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and after said investigation is concluded, if the claim of the State is allowed, said sum shall be returned to the State; but if the claim of the State is rejected, the balance only, if any, above the cost of the investigation shall be returned, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to return said money upon an account rendered by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and if any State shall neglect or refuse for a period of ninety days after notice to deposit said sum, the claim of the State to the tract or tracts of land in question shall be considered as abandoned and forever barred without further investigation: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall have the power to determine what shall be satisfactory and sufficient evidence as to the character of the land at the date of the swamp grant: Provided further, That any agent or inspector appointed by the Department of the Interior to investigate claims under this or prior acts shall have the power to administer oaths and take affidavits of witnesses, both on behalf of the State and the United States, and any witness swearing falsely before such agent or inspector shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction, be punished as now prescribed by law: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall deprive the Government of the right to investigate the matter, in any alleged fraudulent returns of Government surveys, and if land is falsely returned as swamp the claim to the same shall be rejected.

"'SEC. —. That upon the relinquishment, release, and quitclaim, in such form as may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to the United States by the State of Arkansas of all her claims and demands against the United States for the 5 per cent fund allowances under the act approved June 23, 1836, for keeping prisoners under the Executive order of February 5, 1867, for a portion of the distribution fund under the act approved September 4, 1841, for indemnity under the acts approved March 2, 1855, March 3, 1857, and under this act, and for all swamp and overflowed lands under the act approved September 28, 1850, not heretofore approved to the State, and all other claims of whatever kind or nature, the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, cancel or deliver to the proper officer of the said State of Arkansas all the bonds and coupons issued by the said State now in the possession of the Treasurer of the United States and owned or held in trust by the United States as a full and final compromise and settlement of accounts between the said State and United States.

"'SEC. —. That where soldiers' additional homestead entries have been made or initiated upon certificate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the right to make such entry, and there is no adverse claimant, and such certificate is found erroneous or invalid for any cause, the purchaser thereunder, on making proof of such purchase, may perfect his title by payment of the Government price for the land. And nothing herein contained shall prevent the location of soldiers' homestead certificates heretofore issued under the rules and regulations of the General Land Office under section 2306 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or in pursuance of the decision or instructions of the Secretary of the Interior of date of February 1, 1883, when such certificates have been transferred or sold to purchasers in good faith; and all such transfers or sales shall be treated and considered as valid, and patent upon all such locations shall issue in the name of the transferee.

"'SEC. —. That in all cases arising under the homestead or the late preemption laws, where notice of the intention to make final proof has been or shall be published, as provided by the act of March 3, 1879 (20 Stats., 472), and final entry made thereunder, and where no lawful adverse claim has been or shall be filed with the register or receiver of the proper land office prior to such final entry, no contest shall be thereafter allowed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or local land office: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the canceling or holding for cancellation any entry for fraud on the part of the entryman.'

"Strike out the following: 'To protect settlement rights where two or more persons settle upon the same subdivision of agricultural public lands,' and insert the following as the title to the bill: 'To protect settlers, regulate contests, control forest reservations, adjust the swamp-land grants, and for other purposes.'

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make some points of order against this conference report. I claim, first, that it violates, in my opinion, the rules, practice, and custom of the House which limit the conferees appointed by the House to certain lines of procedure within their jurisdiction when in conference.

In the first place, the conference committee can not change the text of a bill to which both Houses have agreed, as they are limited strictly to the matters in dispute between the two Houses. A conference committee may report a substitute if the Senate present a substitute, but the conferees can not inject any new matter not in dispute between the two Houses into their report for the reason that it presents a new subject not considered by either House.

A conference report can not be received if it contains new matter, which ruling by Mr. Speaker Blaine on the point of order made by the late President Garfield was acquiesced in unanimously by the House. Mr. Speaker, the additions which have been made in conference are not germane to the original subject-matter of the bill as it passed the House nor to any of the Senate amendments.

Now, sir, I will be obliged to in great part rely upon the judgment of the Chair in deciding this matter, without being able to point out to the House in detail the objectionable features of the bill, for the reason, which may be evident to all, that this House bill which has been read was a simple measure regarding the forestry laws, and went to the Senate, where some amendments were added to it; then came back to the House, was submitted to a conference committee, and the conferees have practically brought in a new bill, which is a bill made up of several bills not considered by the House.

It is well known, Mr. Speaker, to the members of this House that for some years past efforts have been made to open up the subject of the swamp lands of the country, to change the existing laws by which adjustments are now being made, and practically to set aside the statute of limitations, so that people who have claims, or pretend to have them, against the Government may come before the Land Office of the Interior Department and secure large amounts of money for them.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the laws which were enacted about 1850 to 1857 gave to the people then the power to present their claims to the Government, and practically a great majority, at all events, I will say, of the just claims were filed at that time, and since that period additional claims have also been filed, and, as is shown by the reports from time to time, bills of this character, sometimes extending over a greater territory than at others, and at other times presented in different forms, have been considered, but so far the resistance has been sufficient to prevent change of existing law on the subject.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office in 1891 in his report recommends strongly against there being any doing away of the present limitations permitting the filing of these claims. We have already in this House had a discussion of this matter. Letters were read from the Commissioner of the General Land Office in which he did not approve of the bill then presented, and the House did not pass it.

Since then I have had some occasion to investigate on my own account, by reason of the allusions made to my interference when I opposed the measure in the House, and I took the precaution, Mr. Speaker, to address a communication to the Secretary of the Interior. He did not recommend the passage of the bill which had been before the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Chair and the House to what is deemed to be the duty of a conference committee appointed in such matters. We know that in the closing hours of Congress, such as we find ourselves in to-night, it is very difficult for members of the House to pay attention and realize everything that is being done on the floor of the House and in conference committees, and hence when conferees are appointed they are in duty bound to pay particular attention to the rules, practice, and precedents and will or wishes of the House, under every and all circumstances not to permit anything to be done which by any possibility could amount to a deception on the House, which has intrusted to them the consideration of matters so delicate to be settled, upon which the House is bound to rely.

Mr. Speaker, with reference to the point of order I have made, I refer the Speaker to the Digest of the second session of the Fifty-first Congress, page 350.

I will read this, Mr. Speaker, where it says:

"Neither is it competent for a conference committee to change the text of a bill to which both Houses have agreed, for it is not in conference and the committee has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the text."

And this Digest refers then to a ruling made by Speaker Clay in the first session of the Twelfth Congress, House Journal of 1812. The reference to that I have not with me, but it bears out the general statement I have made.

My claim is that this new matter is out of order, because a conference committee can not report a substitute which has not been proposed in either the Senate or the House and disagreed to by the other body.

In other words, it can not inject or present new matters not in dispute between the two Houses.

And on page 354 of the same Digest it is stated:

"It is in order for a conference committee to report a substitute bill for an original bill, and a substitute therefor proposed by the other House; where two separate bills have thus been referred to a conference committee it is in order to take either, or propose a new bill embracing parts of either.

"The committee has a right to report any bill that is germane to the bills referred to them."

Now, Mr. Speaker, in neither the bill nor the Senate amendments originally made were swamp lands treated, and I have heard enough of the proposed bill to satisfy me that the committee has exceeded its authority, and I make the point of order on this account against the conference report that it is against order, sound parliamentary practice, procedure, and well-established precedents, and on this question I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I shall try not to discuss the merits of this proposition on the pending point of order, as has been done by the gentleman who has made it.

The only question presented by the point of order, as I understand the rules, is whether the amendment proposed by the conference committee is germane to the Senate amendment. That there is a matter in dispute between the two Houses touching swamp-land claims there can be no doubt.

The amendments first read by the Clerk, three pages of printed matter, relate to contests, to forest reservations, reservoir sites, to swamp-land claims, etc. These were all disagreed to by the House. The Senate asked for a conference. The House agreed to it, and the bill went to a conference committee. The first section of the bill was not amended in the Senate, but to that were added, as amendments, the provisions in question. I call the attention of the Speaker to one paragraph of the Senate amendment. It relates directly and exclusively to swamp-land claims, and is as follows:

"That the agents appointed by the Department of the Interior to investigate claims under the swamp-land act, approved September 28, 1850, shall have power to administer oaths and to compel the attendance of witnesses, both on behalf of the State and of the United States, and the witness swearing falsely shall be punished as in cases of perjury."

That, with the other paragraphs, was disagreed to by the House. In lieu of that paragraph the conference committee have submitted a proposition providing, when such agents shall be allowed to investigate swamp-land claims, by limiting them only to such States as have not adopted the field notes as the basis of settlement.

The report of the conference committee makes the field notes of the United States conclusive proof as to the character of the land, and provides for the adjustment of the claims without other testimony in certain States and along lines that have been suggested or approved by the Department of the Interior. This amendment, relating to swamp-land adjustment, was prepared by the Interior Department, and has received the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It looks to the settlement of the grants in question in other methods than those suggested by the Senate amendment, but adjustment is the ultimate object of both the Senate amendment and conference report.

The Senate amendment authorizes the investigation of the claims of the States under the swamp-land act, and would grant to the agents appointed by the Department for that purpose power to compel the attendance of witnesses. For what, I ask, is this investigation of such claims to be had? Evidently it is to enable the Interior Department to adjust and finally settle them. The conference report deals with the same character of claims, but proposes another method of adjustment for the most of the States. Both look to the adjustment of the same claims.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McRAE. I will.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would like to ask whether this proposition was ever voted upon or considered by either House?

Mr. McRAE. The Senate proposition was.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. By which House?

Mr. McRAE. By both. It was proposed by the Senate as an amendment, and then disagreed to by the House, and sent to conference; and now, in lieu of that, the conference committee have submitted a proposition that has for its object the final, just, legal, and quick closing of this whole swamp-land matter, rather than to sending out agents to take testimony touching the character of the land in 1850, as the Senate proposed.

The question to be investigated is whether the land was swamp and overflowed at the time of the grant. That question the conference report will allow to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior upon the field notes of the Government surveys.

There is a reason for this. This Government has paid within the last twelve years $304,000 to special swamp-land agents for investigations of this character. It is time to stop such extravagance. The conference committee propose that the surveys made by the Government surveyors shall be made the basis of settlement and require those States that will not agree to be bound by them to deposit the estimated costs before examinations are made in the field by agents.

Now, the test, Mr. Speaker, as I understand the rule and practice, is this: Is the amendment proposed by the conference germane to the amendment of the Senate to the House bill; and if so, is it in order, whether it is germane to the original proposition or not? Would anyone insist that with the Senate amendment pending in the House as an independent measure that the proposition of the conference committee could not be substituted for it?

I ask the Clerk to read from the Digest the paragraph which I have marked on page 318.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Although the Senate had amended a bill of the House by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a different proposition in some respects, yet having the same object in view, the question presented was not whether the provisions excepted to in the conference report were germane to the original House bill, but whether they were germane to the Senate amendment. In the opinion of the Chair they were clearly germane, for though different from the provision contained in such amendment, they related directly to the same subjects, and under the common parliamentary law and practice might be made, by way of amendment, a substantially different proposition from that originally passed by the House."

Mr. McRAE. In this case, as in the one cited, the propositions are different, but they relate directly to the same subject. Here the amendments both relate to swamp-land contests. The House bill treated of contests between settlers upon unsurveyed lands. The Senate extended it so as to cover those having claims under the timber-culture act, and those on reservoir sites, and to swamp land claims.

The main purpose of the first bill was the settling of contests. That is still the object sought by the conference report. And again, Mr. Speaker, this bill as amended by the Senate is a general land bill, and from beginning to end deals with the methods of the Department touching practice and administration. Such was the general character of the amendments made by the Senate, as well as those proposed by the conference committee. It seems to me there can be no question but that the point of order should be overruled. By a large vote the House has voted to consider the report.

Mr. Speaker, I have but to refer to the bill to which this is an amendment, to wit, the bill of March 3, 1891, passed by the Fifty-first Congress, for a precedent for the action of the committee. That was a bill of one section, I believe, as this was originally. Upon that section a conference committee constructed a general bill of many subjects of twenty-four sections; and that was held to be in order by the Speaker of the last House, and is the law to-day. Nothing is more common in this House except to legislate upon appropriation bills.

Why, Mr. Speaker, half the legislation of Congress is shaped in conference. In the very nature of the case it must be prepared there when the two Houses of Congress disagree. I have nothing to conceal about the course which has been taken in this matter. I regret that by filibustering and misrepresentation the friends of this bill have been denied a vote on it in the House in the usual way, and that we have been driven to the necessity of reaching it in this way; but we have reached it fairly and openly under the rules and without any concealment. There is only one section in this bill which has not been considered by the Committee on Public Lands of this House.

There is not a section in it that does not meet the unqualified indorsement of the Department. It has been unanimously adopted by the Senate, where we have two of the ablest ex-Secretaries of the Interior we have ever had. I mean Senators VILAS and TELLER. The House has always approved it, because it is just and honest. It is an important matter not only to the United States, but to the swamp-land States and settlers as well. I believe that it is as just and honest a measure as was ever presented to the Congress of the United States; I believe the conference report is in accordance with the practice and rules of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not refer to other decisions. It seems to me that the one I have cited ought to be conclusive upon the point in issue, and the point of order should be overruled.

I reserve the balance of my time.

[Cries of "Rule!"]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard very briefly. This is an exceedingly important matter, involving, as it does, the power of conference committees; it may be not simply for this particular bill, but may be as a precedent for the future. I take it for granted that nothing is better settled by the practice of the House and of all parliamentary bodies than that a conference committee can not touch any portion of a bill that has been committed to them as to which both Houses have agreed, and that it is to points of difference between the two Houses that they are confined, and the particular proposition on which there is a disagreement, otherwise conference committees could proceed outside of that entirely and legislate indiscriminately.

Now, I call attention briefly to one thing that has been done in this conference report, and to that I desire the attention of the Chair and of the House. A bill with reference to some disputed settlers' claims, containing comparatively a few lines, passed this House and was sent to the Senate. The Senate struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted another bill, one provision of which was as follows, this being the provision on which the conference committee seek to obtain jurisdiction:

"The agents appointed by the Department of the Interior to investigate claims under the swamp-lands act of September 28, 1850, shall be authorized to administer oaths."

A simple authority was given by the Senate provision to these agents to administer oaths in the investigation of swamp-land claims. Now, that was the original proposition, as to which this House was in disagreement with the Senate, and which was referred to the committee of conference.

On the basis of a disagreement as to that proposition simply, the committee of conference have included the extensive swamp-land adjustment bill, which has been once defeated in this House, a bill which authorizes the adjustment of these claims to the extent of $2,000,000; a bill of the utmost importance, fastened upon a proposition as to whether the agents appointed to adjust these claims shall be authorized to administer oaths—a proposition on which there was a disagreement which was referred to the committee of conference. Undoubtedly the committee of conference could report any amendment relating to the administering of oaths.

There can be no doubt about that. But they have gone outside of that, and undertaken to fasten the complete swamp-lands adjustment bill, to the extent of $2,000,000, a bill covering pages, a bill which has been rejected in this House. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there can be no question but that the committee of conference have gone entirely beyond their jurisdiction.

Mr. PICKLER. This bill never has been considered in this House.

The SPEAKER. This is a very important question. The Chair is ready to decide it. The decision must be made without as much examination of precedents as the Chair would like, but under existing circumstances further delay must be avoided.

The question for the Chair to determine is whether the amendment which has been agreed to and reported by the conference committee is germane to the amendment of the Senate, or to the original bill. The amendment may not be germane to the original bill, yet if it is germane to the Senate amendment, the conference committee might report it.

The Chair thinks, and has always thought, that the practice of enlarging the powers of conference committees beyond the strict letter of the rule was wrong, that conferees ought to be held to the rule, and that amendments they propose in conference reports shall be germane either to the original text or to the amendment. The portion of the Senate amendment which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] claims justifies and authorizes the amendment which the conference committee have reported in this case will now be read by the Clerk.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I also insist that, as the original bill related to contests, and as these matters of contest grow out of swamp lands, and as a part of the amendment of the Senate relates to contests, therefore, for that further reason, the amendment is germane.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the part of the Senate amendment marked by the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

"That the agents appointed by the Department of the Interior to investigate claims under the swamp-lands act approved September 28, 1850, shall have the power to administer oaths and to compel the attendance of witnesses both on behalf of the State and of the United States, and witnesses swearing falsely before them shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction, be punished as now prescribed by law."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read from the Digest the paragraph which the Chair has marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The well-settled rule with respect to the jurisdiction and proceedings of a conference committee is that it is not competent for such committee to consider and report to their respective Houses any new matter, subject, or proposition not in dispute between the two Houses, for the reason that such new matter, subject, or proposition has not been referred to said conference committee, and in that respect it has no greater authority or jurisdiction than is possessed by a standing or a select committee of either House.

"A conference is always asked and granted upon certain specified amendments, and necessarily must be restricted and confined to them; the exceptions being that additional matter which is germane to any particular amendment or amendments is in order. The practice in this regard has, however, been quite loose and irregular, owing largely to the fact that Congress has been without joint rules since the Forty-third Congress."

The SPEAKER. As stated in the Digest, the practice in this matter has been somewhat loose and irregular; yet the Chair thinks that conference committees ought to be held to a strict construction of the rule. In the opinion of the Chair conference committees should keep strictly within the rule, which is that any original amendment which they may recommend to the two Houses must be germane either to the original bill or to the amendments which are in dispute.

The Chair understands that the subject of this Senate amendment is the administration of oaths by special agents of the Interior Department in the investigation of frauds under the swamp-land act. The Chair understands that the amendment reported by the committee goes beyond any question of the duties of such agents, and provides for the adjustment, under the swamp-land act, between the several States and the United States Government of a large number of claims that are unadjusted.

The Chair, regretting, as he stated at the outset, that he has not more time to consider carefully the text of the bill and the precedents on the question, decides that this conference report goes beyond the power and jurisdiction of a conference committee, and can not be received by the House. [Applause.]

Mr. MCRAE. The Chair quoted the Senate amendments as authorizing simply the investigation of frauds under the swamp-land act. In that respect the Chair did not quote correctly. The Senate amendment provides for the investigation of "claims under the swamp-land act"; that is, claims of the States, the same subject to which the conference report relates.

The SPEAKER. The amendment does use the word "claims." The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MCRAE. In view of this correction, does the Chair hold to the same opinion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the same opinion.

Mr. MCRAE. Then, Mr. Speaker, while regretting to do so, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the appeal be laid on the table.

The motion of Mr. Blount was agreed to; and the appeal was accordingly laid on the table.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I desire to be heard briefly on this bill. The substance of the bill has been before Congress in one form or another for some six or eight years. If my information is correct, in 1888 there was a movement made to inaugurate a compromise, something on the line of the one now before us, and a similar measure was introduced several times afterwards, until finally the act of 1894 authorized the proceeding which has resulted in the compromise which this bill proposes to ratify.

It appears that as far back as 1838 the legislature of Arkansas passed a bill to incorporate a real-estate bank, or a bank resting upon capital secured by mortgages on real estate, with a capital of $2,000,000. The bank was authorized to borrow money to carry on its business, the State guaranteeing the bonds. Out of that act and the proceedings following it came the borrowing by the State of Arkansas from the United States of the money represented by the bonds provided for in this agreement.

The State of Arkansas was admitted in 1836. Some years afterwards several acts of Congress were passed granting to that State, as had been done to other new States, certain swamp lands, different acts of Congress granting the same character of land. Some were for one purpose and some for another. I have a statement here showing what the different land grants were for. One of them was for building court-houses and jails, one of them for public buildings at the capital of the State, one for educational purposes, and so on.

The State of Arkansas has not paid any of the bonds. I have a statement showing the total number of the bonds which the State owes to the United States, amounting in all to $793,000. The bonds were issued at different times. The State has ceased to pay the interest upon them, beginning with the first as far back as 1861. Now the accumulated interest unpaid amounts to $1,878,952.50. The principal being $792,000, it appears that the interest due and unpaid—perhaps Senators will quarrel about the word "due"—but the interest unpaid, at least, amounts to more than twice as much as the principal; and if the principal and accumulated interest were added together they would amount to a total of $2,671,952.50. Then there is an amount due the State of $202,000. Subtracting that leaves a total amount due the United States of $2,469,659.17. The State comes in with a counterclaim, if I may use the expression, and a compromise, a settlement, is asked. The act of Congress of 1894 provided:

That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, acting as agents of the United States, should deal with the governor of the State of Arkansas as the agent of that State, and that they should agree if possible upon a compromise.

Now, we have that compromise included in the report of the Committee on Public Lands, and it is for the purpose of ratifying the compromise so entered into that the pending bill has been prepared. It appears that the first thing agreed upon by the representatives of the United States with the governor of Arkansas is—

To surrender to the party of the second part—

Namely, the State of Arkansas—for cancellation 500 6 per cent coupon bonds of $1,000 each, numbered from 1 to 500, inclusive, dated January 1, 1838, and matured October 26, 1861, issued by the State of Arkansas to secure a loan from the Smithsonian fund, and now held and owned by the United States.

The second part of the agreement is that the Government shall—

Surrender the coupons attached thereto, representing the unpaid accumulated interest on said bonds, amounting to the sum of $436,303.61.

Then, there are other recitals, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, all of the same character, going in groups of two, paragraph 3, for example, reading—

To surrender similar bonds.

And paragraph 4:

To surrender the coupons attached thereto.

And so on with 5, 6, and 7.

Then:

In consideration of the surrender by the parties of the first part to the party of the second part the bonds, coupons, and accumulated amounts of interest hereinabove set forth, the party of the second part, by virtue of the powers aforesaid conferred upon him, hereby makes the following agreement, conditioned on the approval thereof by Congress, namely:

1. To cause to be paid into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $572 within thirty days after the approval by Congress of this settlement.

2. To cause to be paid, at or before their maturity (January 1, 1900), the remaining Arkansas bonds, being 160 in number, of $1,000 each.

And this is all the cash that is proposed to be paid by the State of Arkansas to the United States in consideration of the surrender and cancellation of all of the bonds and all of the accumulated interest thereon in addition. That would make $160,572. Those two items are all that the State proposes to pay.

Again:

As a further consideration for the surrender of the aforesaid bonds, coupons, etc., the party of the second part hereby relinquishes and quitclaims to the United States all claims or demands, adjusted or unadjusted, growing out of the act of September 28, 1850, known as the swamp-land act; also, all land or cash indemnity growing out of the acts of March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857; also, all claims for indemnity school lands, the residue of the salt-spring lands, the residue of the lands under the court-house and jail grant (act June 15, 1832), the residue of lands under act of September 4, 1841, for internal improvements, the residue of the grant under the acts of March 2, 1831, and June 3, 1836, for public buildings, and all other claims or demands of whatever nature or character.

It is observed here that there are some five or six different classes of land that are proposed to be relinquished to the United States. It does not appear anywhere in the report from the committee to the Senate that any portion of those lands has been passed upon in the Land Office, or by the Secretary of the Interior, or by any person who is authorized to pass upon them. In other words, as far as I am able to gather the history of this case, a large portion of the lands referred to do not belong and never did belong to the State of Arkansas, because, as is shown in a report of the Commissioner of the Land Office which I have before me, a considerable portion of the lands were granted in such way that the land officers are not able to specify the exact quantity of land granted because of the absence of information to show just what lands were actually conveyed.

Then, further, as to some of the lands for which the State claims a cash indemnity under the terms of the grant it is not entitled to a cash indemnity. The State was entitled to lands, to lands in place. Not having selected the lands, not having asked for them, not having received a patent for them, in other words, having done nothing whatever about it, the State now claims a cash indemnity for them.

Still further, I find that the State claims cash indemnity of $5 per acre for land that could not be sold for 12½ cents an acre—land the original price of which was $1.25 an acre—and if they were all swamp lands they never have been worth more than 12½ cents an acre, and probably are not worth more than that now.

In order that I may get before the Senate the point I wish to make, I will read a paragraph from a letter of the General Land Office transmitting some land reports to the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives:

The subcommittee request more specific and definite information than is contained in the report which accompanies the articles of agreement; and submit a large number of questions for answer.

Many of the questions propounded are manifestly based on the official action of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, or their representatives, and upon these I shall refrain from expressing any opinion. To the questions that relate to the business of this office, I submit the following observations and answers, namely:

1. By office letter (M) dated November 17, 1894, there was transmitted to your office Tabular Statements 1, 2, and 3, showing the status of the State's claim under the school and internal-improvement grants as deduced from various data in the several divisions of this office, and an additional statement (with seven exhibits) showing the status of the claim under the swamp-land grant, as represented on the selection records of the swamp land division of this office. The seven exhibits above referred to are composed of hundreds of pages of listing paper, upon which are described, by subdivisions, sections, townships, and ranges, about 15,654 tracts—estimated to average 40 acres each and aggregating about 626,160 acres—remaining unsettled on the selection records of the swamp land division.

2. To the questions that relate to the business of this office I answer as follows:

Question 1. "How many acres of swamp lands in place are now due the State?"

Answer. This question can not be answered, for the reason that the swamp-land grant is not a grant of quantity, but is an indefinite grant. The grant is of * * * "the whole of those swamp and overflowed lands, made unfit thereby for cultivation, which shall remain unsold at the passage of this act," * * * and as no precise, satisfactory method of determining which are swamp from arable lands has been discovered, and as there is no limit of time in which the State may assert new claims and no limit to the quantity it may claim and upon which it may demand a settlement by the Land Department, it is utterly impossible at this time to determine the amount due the State under the swamp-land grant.

Senators will see from the reading of the answer which I have just read from the Commissioner of the General Land Office that in one particular class of cases there is great difficulty of determining what particular lands are due the State and what are not due the State.

In connection with that matter I have two or three letters here from citizens of Kansas who are personally interested in those lands. One of the letters is from Atchison, and comes from a firm of lumber dealers who have friends and business associates in the State of Arkansas. The letter, which is directed to me, reads as follows:

We herewith inclose you copy of letter from Mr. F. Pierce, vice-president Arkadelphia Lumber Company, Daleville, Ark., to Hon. GEORGE M. CURTIS, M. C.; also copy of letter from C. C. Henderson to Capt. R. W. Huie, general manager and secretary Arkadelphia Lumber Company and general manager Ultima Thule, Arkadelphia and Mississippi Railway, both of which are self-explanatory. We would ask that you carefully examine the situation as explained in the inclosures, and we are satisfied that you will at once observe the injustice that is about to be attempted on innocent purchasers of these swamp lands.

Before I read further from this letter I will read a clause in the compromise, page 3, second paragraph:

It is also agreed that any person who has heretofore filed a declaration of preemption, resides on, cultivates, or has purchased, under the laws of the State of Arkansas, any selected and unconfirmed swamp land hereby relinquished to the United States, his heirs or assigns, shall have the preference right for one year from this date to purchase such land from the United States at the minimum price for public lands, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

It appears from this article that persons who have purchased any of these lands from the State of Arkansas under the laws of that State, such lands being now relinquished to the United States, shall have the right of purchase again from the United States. They may purchase twice. They have already purchased from the State of Arkansas and they have paid for the lands. Now they shall have preference over other persons for one year to purchase the same lands from the United States. There is where my people come in.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me? Do I understand they will purchase at $1.25 per acre the lands for which we allow $5?

Mr. PEFFER. I am not certain as to what particular class the lands belong. I will read a little further, and perhaps we will both gather it. I did not think about identifying the particular class. They are swamp lands, I am confident, partly covered with timber. I read further from the letter:

These parties, with several others, and ourselves among the rest, bought and paid their money to the State of Arkansas in good faith for these lands, and certainly should not now be called on to help pay the debt due from the State of Arkansas to the Government of the United States. We paid our money in good faith for these lands and have since paid our taxes on them, which is all that is required by any civilized government dealing in good faith with its loyal citizens. We, with many others that have purchased a portion of these lands, are operating mills in Arkansas, and we hope that the Representatives in Congress from the State of Kansas will see to it that their constituents are not robbed.

You can see from the language used that those gentlemen are not feeling very kindly about it.

Then here is one of the letters referred to by my correspondent. It is dated Daleville, Ark., February 28, 1896, and is directed to Captain Huie, general manager of the Ultima Thule, Arkadelphia and Mississippi Railway, Arkadelphia, Ark. I begin with the second paragraph:

The more I think about the State of Arkansas, or any other State, especially under Democratic administration, which is always presumably above reproach, playing a double-handed game like the State of Arkansas is trying to play with innocent and honest purchasers of land from her, the more I am mortified and astounded. It is true that the State of Arkansas only quitclaims this land; but if I know anything about principle, equity, justice, or law, when I quitclaim a piece of property I part with all my right, title, and interest in said property, and would not have any manner or means or method of adjustment, the moral or legal right to go and resell that piece of property to another person. The State of Arkansas sold this land to us, quitclaimed it, and now it proposes to use it in settling a debt that it owes the United States Government, knowing that, if it succeeds in working this land into this settlement with the Government, it defeats us and destroys our title to said land.

It may be that those gentlemen are all mistaken as to their rights and wrongs in the case, and I feel very confident that the Senators from Arkansas, who are strenuously urging the passage of the bill, would not present to the Senate for ratification a settlement which in their judgment is not in all respects just between the two parties. Nevertheless, while that is true, here are some persons who regard their interests as being jeopardized to a greater or less extent, and we have had so much experience of that kind in the Western country, that when in the distance even, when we smell the battle from afar, we are nervous and fearful lest we shall have to face a long and costly litigation. It is for that reason I think the motion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] ought to prevail. The bill ought to be recommitted to the committee, with a view of having a little more time to procure the necessary information, in order that Senators may vote upon it intelligently.

I have information that an elaborate report is now in progress of preparation; that, in fact, the records of the Land Office have been ransacked and that every different act of Congress granting lands to the State of Arkansas for any purpose has been overhauled, and all the lands that have been granted or have been claimed or that are in any wise connected with this transaction are identified, and that a full report has been made in writing upon the entire subject involved in this great field of controversy. I think that in a short time, probably this week, as my information is, the report will be ready, so that we could use it here within a few days. If so, it would not only aid us here materially, but it would aid us in satisfying the people who are behind us.

When a similar bill was before the Senate at the last session I asked to have it amended by striking out the third paragraph, on page 3, but the Senators from Arkansas were then of opinion, as they are now, that we must adopt the report in toto or not adopt it at all; we might amend the bill, but we can not amend the report. I have been studying how the bill could be so amended as to cover the point really in controversy. But I do not see how it can be done, and for that reason I suppose we would either have to take the compromise just as it is and adopt it, or reject it as a whole. That is an additional reason why I should like the Senate to have a little more time on it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not recommit the bill, for the reason that two years ago the Senate authorized two of the Secretaries, representing the Government, acting in conjunction with the governor of the State of Arkansas, to ascertain the indebtedness on each side and to make a settlement. They have gone over the complicated details of an unsettled account between the Government and the State running for sixty years. Of course there are litigated questions; there are equities on both sides of all those questions, and the very best that possibly could be done would be to make a just and equitable settlement of all these controversies.

I believe sincerely that the settlement made by the Secretaries and the governor yields a large amount of money justly and fairly due to the State, but we have been asking the Government for twenty years to make some sort of a settlement of the long-standing controversy. We are willing to accept this, which we regard as a hard settlement, rather than to have the matter stand open longer. I hope the Senate will now pass the bill and will not recommit it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we ought to have a yea-and-nay vote on the question. There are very few Senators here.

Mr. FAULKNER. Let the yeas and nays come on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator from Illinois will allow the yeas and nays to come on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Let us take them on this question.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let us take a vote on the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for a call of the Senate. There are very few Senators present.

Mr. PEFFER. I was just going to suggest the lack of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Clark,	Hoar,	Platt,
Allison,	Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,
Bacon,	Cullom,	Lindsay,	Proctor,
Baker,	Daniel,	McBride,	Quay,
Bate,	Davis,	McMillan,	Roach,
Berry,	Dubois,	Mantle,	Sewell,
Blackburn,	Elkins,	Mills,	Teller,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Turpie,
Burrows,	Frye,	Morrill,	Vest,
Butler,	Gordon,	Peffer,	Walthall,
Call,	Gray,	Perkins,	Wetmore,
Cannon,	Hill,	Pettigrew,	Wolcott.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. PEFFER. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. I move again that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BAKER and Mr. MORRILL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH]. I do not know how he would vote, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I do not know how he would vote if he were present.

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and not knowing how he would vote, I withhold mine.

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN.] Unless I am advised that he would vote "nay" I shall not vote.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] would vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. QUAY. Then I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL.] Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT (after having voted in the affirmative). My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is absent unpaired. I am very sure that he would vote as I have voted, and if any Senator desires to transfer a pair to my colleague he can do so and be enabled to vote.

Mr. MORRILL. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], and I vote "yea."

Mr. DUBOIS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], but I understand that he would vote "nay," if present. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS, after having voted in the affirmative). The present occupant of the chair withdraws his vote, as he observes that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], with whom he is paired, is not present.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	McMillan,	Platt,
Allison,	Davis,	Morrill,	Wetmore.
Baker,	Elkins,	Peffer,
Brown,	Gear,	Perkins,

NAYS—29.

Gallinger,	McBride,	Sherman,	Wilson,
George,	Martin,	Shoup,	Wolcott.
Gibson,	Mills,	Smith,
Hale,	Mitchell, Wis.	Squire,

Mr. GEAR. I understand that no quorum has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum having voted, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Clark,	Hill,	Perkins,
Allen,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Platt,
Allison,	Daniel,	Jones, Ark.	Pritchard,
Bacon,	Davis,	Lindsay,	Proctor,

Butler,	Gordon,	Morrill,	Walthall,
Call,	Gorman,	Pasco,	Wetmore,
Cannon,	Gray,	Peffer,	Wolcott.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], but I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." Therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of transfer of my pair as before, and vote "nay."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. SEWELL (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. WARREN] is detained from the Chamber by illness. I do not know how he would vote if present.

Mr. MILLS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and vote "nay."

Mr. PRITCHARD. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and vote "yea."

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE], but in order to make a quorum I will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	McMillan,	Proctor,
Allison,	Davis,	Morrill,	Wetmore,
Baker,	Elkins,	Peffer,	Wolcott.

So the Senate refused to recommit the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. GEAR. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], but I understand that he would vote "yea" if he were present; therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], but I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and vote "yea."

Mr. MORRILL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], but I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. PRITCHARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], but being assured that he would vote for the passage of the bill if present, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], but as this is not a political question, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to announce that upon this vote the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. WILSON].

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—38.

Allen,	Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Quay,
Bacon,	Daniel,	Kyle,	Roach,
Bate,	Dubois,	Lindsay,	Teller,
Berry,	Faulkner,	McBride,	Tillman,
Blackburn,	Frye,	Mantle,	Turpie,
Butler,	George,	Mills,	Vest,
Caffery,	Gordon,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Walthall,
Call,	Gorman,	Pasco,	White.

Chilton,	Jones, Nev.	Sherman,
Elkins,	Lodge,	Shoup,
Gallinger,	Martin,	Smith,

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4254) granting to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota.

The message also requested the Senate to transmit to the House a certified engrossed copy of the bill (S. 640) to increase the pension of Joseph W. Fisher, to replace the original engrossed copy, which had been lost.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions:

A joint resolution (S. R. 111) to authorize Benjamin Harrison to accept certain medals presented to him while President of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 114) authorizing and directing Bernard R. Green to exercise the duties and powers heretofore conferred upon the late Gen. Thomas L. Casey in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 3292) granting an honorable discharge to Seth Porter Church, alias Samuel Church; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1159) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses be made the special order for Thursday afternoon next, April 2, at 2 o'clock. It is an important matter, and should be considered in connection with or about the time of the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill named by him be made the special order for Thursday next at 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose that appropriation bills are always in order, notwithstanding a special order.

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not wish a special order to interfere with the Du Pont case.

Mr. PLATT. It can not.

Mr. FRYE. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the fact that there is a special order preceding the one which he has just asked to be made.

Mr. PROCTOR. I understand that, and supposed this would be subject to a previous special order.

Mr. FRYE. Very well, then.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to ask, in regard to the special order suggested by the Senator from Vermont, whether it is the intention to press that bill as an addition to the general fortifications appropriation bill?

Mr. PROCTOR. Not being chairman of the committee and not having reported the bill, I am not prepared to answer fully in that regard. I have no plan and I think the committee has no plan to antagonize the appropriation bill or to add this bill to it or to interfere with it in any way. The desire is merely to bring this very important matter fairly before the Senate in some form.

Mr. GORMAN. If that bill proposing to appropriate $100,000,000 is to be pressed at this time, of course it must come up in the ordinary way, and be considered when the Senate is prepared for it. The Senator asks unanimous consent that the bill shall be considered at the time named. If it is understood that there is with the unanimous consent an agreement to do anything more than simply to consider the bill at the convenience of the Senate, I shall object to unanimous consent; in other words, I do not want to give that bill any special preference over the other legislation of this session. I do not object to a mere motion to make the bill a special order, but I do not want to have it understood by any means that unanimous consent is given to consider it to the exclusion of other business.

Mr. PROCTOR. I did not understand that my request carried with it any more than the ordinary consent to make the bill a special order for the time named.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PLATT. Who made the objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to object.

Mr. PLATT. I did not understand that the Senator from Maryland made objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. GORMAN. I did not make an objection to having the bill fixed as a special order for the day named by the Senator from Vermont, provided that by the unanimous consent it is not to be considered that thereafter we shall continue the consideration of that bill. The custom has grown up recently, and only recently I think, that giving unanimous consent makes a continuing special order. I do not want it to be understood that that unanimous consent will compel us to consider that bill to the exclusion of other business. If it is understood that the bill is not given any special privileges, I have no objection.

Mr. MILLS. I will settle this controversy by objecting. Let the bill come up regularly.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that there be laid before the Senate the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 102) directing the Secretary of the Interior to open for public entry all that certain part of the public domain in the State of Utah known as the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside without prejudice, stating as the reason for the request that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] was obliged to absent himself from the Senate Chamber to-day, and not supposing that this order of business would be reached so early in the afternoon, he requested that it might go over, as he desires to be heard upon it. I greatly regret the necessity of deferring the measure, because we are anxious to bring it up, but I assented to his desire that it might go over without losing its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks that the unfinished business may be passed over without prejudice. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. To be brought up to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it will come up to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. Let us go to the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. The bill (H. R. 3206) to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the extermination of fur-bearing animals in Alaska," and for other purposes, was assigned as a special order two or three weeks ago. It has been displaced by other questions and by unfinished business. The joint resolution of the Senator from Utah [Mr. CANNON] became the unfinished business when I did not happen to be here, or I should at the time have objected to it, but it has its place as unfinished business. I am not prepared to proceed with the special order to-day, because the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] desires to submit a few brief remarks in relation to the bill, and he is not present. Therefore I consent, without any hesitation, that the Calendar be taken up under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PEFFER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. CANNON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, do I understand now that the unfinished business of to-day comes up to-morrow at 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose always subject to appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Appropriation bills are privileged anyway.

Mr. PEFFER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896.

Mr. COCKRELL. If we are going to lay aside the regular order, why not go to the Calendar?

Mr. FRYE. The request made was that we should go to the Calendar under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us go to the Calendar, and let everyone take his chances.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] gave notice this morning that at the earliest moment to-morrow he desired to make some observations on the contested-election case. I give notice now that when his remarks shall have been completed I shall move to take up the Post-Office appropriation bill. I do this so that there may be no trouble about what will be done to-morrow as to the unfinished business.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us proceed with the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first bill on the Calendar.

SUBJECT CATALOGUE OF LAW LIBRARY.

The joint resolution (S. R. 69) authorizing the preparation of a subject catalogue of the books in the law library was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over without losing its place.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that that joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WOLCOTT. On the request of a Senator near me, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PLATT. Then let the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY.

The bill (S. 1999) to provide for the observance of the 12th day of February as a national holiday was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to have that bill go to the Calendar. I do not think it worth while to have it called up every day. It should be put under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over under Rule IX.

GEORGE H. PLANT.

The bill (S. 1083) for the relief of George H. Plant, of the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George H. Plant, of the District of Columbia, $5,216.85, that being the amount found to be due to him by the Court of Claims for losses and damages sustained by him by reason of a collision between the U. S. S. Gettysburg and the steamboat Lady of the Lake, on the Potomac River, and to be received by him in full satisfaction of all claims and demands in consequence of said collision.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Claims whether that is a judgment of the Court of Claims, or whether it is a finding under the Bowman Act?

Mr. PASCO. In the absence of the chairman of the committee, I will state that I examined the case as a subcommittee, and these are findings of fact, as the Senator will see by referring to the report.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator is entirely satisfied that the claim ought to be paid?

Mr. PASCO. It has been reported twice, to my knowledge, by the Committee on Claims, and passed the Senate during the last Congress.

Mr. PLATT. All right.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg to inquire if there is any law under which the United States is liable for damages in such cases?

Mr. PASCO. There are a great many precedents, I will say to the Senator from Virginia, where cases of this kind have been acted upon favorably by the Committee on Claims and by the Senate.

This case, as the Senator from Virginia will remember, was considered at great length while he was a member of the committee, and this result was reached, as set out at length in the report, which is the same as that made during the last Congress.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the report may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, February 12, 1896, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. COCKRELL. That is a very long report. I think it is equivalent to consuming more than five minutes under the general rule. Let that case be passed over without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PASCO. I hope the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is satisfied from an examination of the report that this bill ought to pass, and that it be acted upon now. It has been waiting its turn in regular order for a good while.

Mr. DANIEL. It seems to me in this case that there is evidence of negligence on the part of the Lady of the Lake, with which the claimant was connected. The bill is for the relief of George H. Plant, of the District of Columbia, he being at the time the owner of the steamboat Lady of the Lake, which came in collision with the Gettysburg, a ship of the United States, and the steamboat was injured. I do not see any answer in the report——

Mr. PASCO. The Senator will see from an examination of the record that the fault was found to be with the Government vessel. The Supreme Court, in the case of the Siren (7 Wallace, 152), which is quoted on the fourth page of the report, has laid down the general law that—

> A claim for damages exists against a vessel of the United States guilty of a maritime tort as much as if the offending vessel belonged to a private citizen. In ordinary cases, however, such a claim can not be enforced, because, for reasons of public policy, jurisdiction is withheld from the courts.

Mr. DANIEL. That the ship was guilty of contributory negligence and the grounds of recovery are not set forth in the report. I do not pretend to be very familiar with this class of cases, and would listen to what might be said by my colleague with very great deference; but the report of Commander John H. Russell, the president of the naval court of inquiry, shows that "the pilot of the Lady of the Lake, though technically in the wrong, can not, in the circumstances, be considered as being very censurable." This is not a bill to censure him, but a bill to pay damages. Under those circumstances, even if the Government should be liable in such a case for damages, it does not appear to my mind on what ground the judgment could be justified.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be passed over.

Mr. PASCO. The Court of Claims found that a United States vessel was responsible for the damages and the United States local inspectors of steamers reached the same conclusion, and that has been the result of an examination of the case twice by the Committee on Claims. With all those findings against the Government vessel in its own courts and by its own officers, it seems to me it is clear that the claim ought to be paid.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be passed over.

Mr. PASCO. If it is to be passed over, I ask that it be without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PASCO. I ask that the report, which was partly read by the Secretary, may, by unanimous consent, be printed in full in the RECORD as if read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none.

The report submitted by Mr. PASCO February 12, 1896, is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1083) for the relief of George H. Plant, of the District of Columbia, have carefully examined the same and submit the following report thereon:

This claim has been before the committee on former occasions, and was originally for a larger amount. It met with favorable consideration, so far as the amount contained in the present bill was concerned, and the bills before the committee were amended in accordance with the recommendation of the committee.

The merits of the case have been fully stated in the former reports of the committee, and the following extract from the report made in the Fifty-second Congress, in which the facts are set forth, is adopted as a part of the present report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 707) for the relief of George H. Plant, of the District of Columbia, have carefully considered the same and submit the following report thereon:

The claimant in 1874 was the owner of a steamboat named the Lady of the Lake, then plying upon the waters of the Potomac River. On the 30th day of May of that year the boat was injured in a collision with the U. S. S. Gettysburg. On the 9th day of June the Secretary of the Navy appointed a court of inquiry to investigate all the circumstances relating to the collision, and report its causes, and upon whom the blame, if any, should rest. The findings of the court will be given in full further on in this report. Though some blame was cast upon the officers of the Lady of the Lake, the court found the officers of the Gettysburg responsible for the collision. Subsequently the Treasury Department ordered an investigation to be made by the supervising inspectors of steam vessels. They reported on the 17th day of July, 1874, that the pilot in charge of the Lady of the Lake complied with all the rules and regulations for the government of pilots applicable to the case, and that he was exonerated from all blame in the premises.

But no relief followed these findings of the two Departments, and the claimant found that he could only receive compensation for his damage and loss by legislative action. Accordingly a bill was introduced into the Senate in his behalf in the Forty-sixth Congress, and a similar bill in each successive Congress till the Forty-eighth, when on the 27th day of February, 1884, the claim was referred to the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1883.

On June 2, 1890, the court filed its findings of fact, and they were transmitted to the Senate June 6, 1890, and appear in Miscellaneous Document, Fifty-first Congress, first session, No. 159. The report of the case is here given in full:

[Court of Claims. Congressional case No. 32. George H. Plant vs. The United States.]

At a Court of Claims held in the city of Washington on the 2d day of June, A. D. 1890, the court filed the following findings of fact, to wit:

FINDINGS OF FACT.

The claim or matter in the above-entitled case was transmitted to the court by the Senate Committee on Claims on the 27th day of February, 1884.

Messrs. Goode & Goode, esqs., appeared for claimant, and the Attorney-General, by Henry M. Foote, esq., his assistant, and under his direction, appeared for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States.

The case having been brought to a hearing on the 19th of May, 1890, the court, upon the evidence and after considering the briefs and arguments of counsel on both sides, finds the facts to be as follows:

I.

About sundown on May 30, 1874, a collision occurred on the Potomac River, nearly opposite Fort Washington, between the U. S. S. Gettysburg and the Lady of the Lake, under the following circumstances:

The Lady of the Lake had been down the river, with an excursion party from Washington, consisting of about 600 persons, and was on her return trip.

The Gettysburg, commanded by Lieutenant McRitchie, was going down.

When first sighted the steamers were about three-fourths of a mile apart. At that time the Lady of the Lake was on the Virginia side of the river and the Gettysburg on the Maryland side.

By the law of the road each steamer was required to keep to the right in passing, but the law also permitted them, by signal agreement, to keep to the left.

The officers of the Lady of the Lake preferred to hold their course on the Virginia side, because by so doing they avoided, to some extent, the rapid current of the ebbing tide. They also supposed the Gettysburg would prefer the Maryland side, because the channel there was deepest and the assisting current strongest.

Therefore, when the steamers were about half a mile apart, the pilot of the Lady of the Lake gave two blasts of her steam whistle, which was the proper signal to request that the steamers might pass by each keeping to the left. The pilot of the Gettysburg immediately responded by two blasts of the whistle, which was the proper signal of assent to the proposal. Each steamer then held her course for about a quarter of a mile. Then the Gettysburg, by order of Lieutenant McRitchie, gave one blast of her whistle, which is the proper signal for each vessel to keep to the right; and immediately ported her helm, thus directing her course to the Virginia side of the river. The Lady of the Lake immediately responded with two blasts of the whistle, thus indicating her wish to pass on the left, as already agreed, and held her course. A collision was imminent and both steamers reversed their engines, but collision could not then be avoided.

The bow of the Gettysburg struck the Lady of the Lake on her starboard bow, crushing in the upper and lower decks. No persons were injured.

Both Lieutenant McRitchie and the claimant agree in their testimony that the signals were given and heard by the officers of each steamer as above detailed.

The Gettysburg, by porting her helm and directing her course to the Virginia side of the river without timely warning, caused the collision.

II.

The rule established by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, undsecertion 29 of the act of February 28, 1871 (16 Stat., 450), to be observed by steam vessels in passing each other on rivers is as follows:

"RULE 1. When steamers are approaching each other 'head and head,' or nearly so, it shall be the duty of each steamer to pass to the right, or on the port side of the other; and the pilot of either steamer may be first in determining to pursue this course, and thereupon shall give, as a signal of his intention, one short and distinct blast of his steam whistle, which the pilot of the other steamer shall answer promptly by a similar blast of his steam whistle, and thereupon such steamers shall pass to the right, or on the port side of each other. But if the course of such steamers is so far on the starboard of each other as not to be considered by the pilots as meeting 'head and head,' or nearly so, or if the vessels are approaching each other in such a manner that passing to the right (as above directed) is deemed unsafe by the pilot of either vessel, the pilot so first deciding shall immediately give two short and distinct blasts of his steam whistle, which the pilot of the other steamer shall answer promptly by two similar blasts of his steam whistle, and they shall pass to the left, or on the starboard side of each other.

["NOTE.—In the night steamers will be considered meeting 'head and head' so long as both the colored lights of each are in view of the other. In the day a similar position will also be considered 'head and head.'"]

III.

June 9, 1874, the Secretary of the Navy constituted, by the following order, a naval court of inquiry:

To Commander JOHN H. RUSSELL,
United States Navy, Rockville, Md.:

By virtue of the authority conferred by the "Act for the better government of the Navy of the United States," approved July 11, 1862, I hereby appoint Commander John H. Russell president, Commander Montgomery Sicard and Lieut. Commander Frederick Rodgers members, and First Lieut. George C. Reid, of the Marine Corps, judge-advocate of a court of inquiry, which is ordered to convene at the navy-yard, Washington, D. C., on Thursday, the 11th day of June, 1874, for the purpose of investigating all the circumstances relating to the collision which took place on the Potomac River, near Fort Washington, on or about the 30th day of May, 1874, between the U. S. S. Gettysburg and the steamboat Lady of the Lake. In performing this duty the court will study closely the "Rules of the Road" and act of Congress relating thereto, and state the cause or causes that brought about the collision, with its opinion as to where the blame, if any, should rest.

Given under my hand at the Navy Department of the United States this 9th day of June, in the year 1874.

GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

June 19, 1874, the court found as follows:

That both the U. S. S. Gettysburg and the steamboat Lady of the Lake were subject to the act of Congress approved April 29, 1864 (page 158, Naval Laws), for preventing collisions on the water, and in addition to the above the court find that the Lady of the Lake was subject to certain rules laid down by the Board of Supervising Inspectors in pursuance of the act of Congress of February 28, 1871.

There is no conflict between these two sets of "rules," but the rules of the Board of Supervisors supplement the naval "Rules of the Road" by certain whistle blasts or signals to be used between vessels, subject to the directions of the Board of Supervising Inspectors.

As regards the facts connected with the collision, the weight of evidence, in the opinion of the court, establishes the point that the vessels, at the time of the exchange of their first whistle signals, must be considered as coming under article 13 of the "rules" for preventing collisions on the water (Naval Laws, page 161), and also under rule 1 of the "Rules issued by the Board of Supervising Inspectors for the government of pilots"; that is, they were meeting end, or nearly so. In this position the law requires that the helms of both vessels be put to port, and inasmuch as this course was not pursued by the Lady of the Lake, the court deem that vessel to have acted in violation of law, and find that her pilot committed an error of judgment in putting his helm to starboard.

At the same time, as the wording of the law (article 13), "end on or nearly end on," implies a certain margin for judgment on the part of pilots, the court are of the opinion that the pilot of the Lady of the Lake, though technically in the wrong, can not in the circumstances be considered as being very censurable.

As the vessels are considered as coming within the scope of article 13 of the law for preventing collisions on the water, the court find that the Gettysburg acted in violation of law in answering the Lady of the Lake's two whistles and in putting his helm to starboard; and that the fact of her pilot having done those acts renders her responsible for the collision.

The pilots of the two vessels are, therefore, considered by the court as having been principally to blame for the collision. Lieutenant McRitchie was following "the rule of the road" in putting his helm aport, as the weight of evidence shows that if both vessels had done so from the first signal the collision would in all probability have been avoided.

But when it became evident that the Lady of the Lake did not pursue the same course, and that a collision was very probable, he would, in the opinion of the court, have been justified in shifting his helm (in accordance with article 19, page 162, Rules of the Road—Naval Laws).

The evidence shows that after a collision became probable both vessels stopped and reversed their engines, in conformity with article 16, Rules of the Road, page 161, Naval Laws.

JOHN H. RUSSELL,
Commander, U. S. N., President Naval Court of Inquiry.

GEORGE C. REID,
First Lieutenant, U. S. Marine Corps, Judge-Advocate.

The Treasury Department also authorized an investigation by the supervising inspectors of steam vessels, who made the following report:

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES
LOCAL INSPECTORS OF STEAM VESSELS.
Baltimore, July 17th, 187

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, we proceeded to Washington, D. C., to take the testimony of witnesses in the collision between the United States steamer Gettysburg and steamer Lady of the Lake, which occurred on the Potomac River, off Fort Washington, on the evening of 30th of May, 1874, and, after having received said testimony, both on the part of the officers of the Lady of the Lake, together with a number of disinterested passengers of said steamer, we find that the pilot in charge of the Lady of the Lake complied with all the rules and regulations for the government of pilots applicable to said case, and is therefore exonorated from all blame in the premises.

(They report also their inability to get the officers of the Gettysburg to testify.)

JAMES D. LOWRY,
WILLIAM O. SAVILLE,
United States Local Inspectors of Steamers, Baltimore District.

JOHN HENSHAW, Esq.,
Supervising Inspector of Steam Vessels, Third District.

IV.

May 30, 1874, the claimant was the owner of the Lady of the Lake, except a small interest, valued at $2,500, which he had agreed to transfer to —— Partridge, the captain of the boat. This interest had not been paid for, and claimant arranged with Captain Partridge for it and took it back.

V.

At the time of the collision the Lady of the Lake was engaged in the business of carrying freight and passengers between Washington and Norfolk and taking excursion parties up and down the river. It was the busy season of the year, and her business was large and profitable.

The cost of repairing the boat amounted to $2,216.85. The loss in earnings while undergoing repairs amounted to $3,000.

After resuming her regular trips her earnings, in consequence of the interruption and loss of confidence in her safety, were much diminished. This loss can not be accurately calculated, but may be safely estimated at $1,500.

[SEAL.]

JOHN RANDOLPH.
Assistant Clerk Court of Claims.

No action was taken upon the findings and opinion of the court during the Fifty-first Congress, except to refer the case to this committee with a bill to carry them out. During the time that the matter has been pending in the Senate and this committee and the Court of Claims, various bills have been introduced into the House of Representatives for the claimant's relief, but no final action has ever been there taken.

The Court of Claims came to the same conclusion as to the responsibility for the collision that was reached in the former investigations, and it only remains to be determined whether an appropriation shall be made in favor of the claimant, and if so, in what amount.

It is true that the Government does not hold itself generally responsible for acts of wrong or negligence on the part of its subordinate officers or agents, but this rule has not always been considered as applicable to cases of maritime collisions. It has been decided by the Supreme Court in the case of The Siren (7 Wallace, 152) that a claim for damages exists against a vessel of the United States guilty of a maritime tort, as much as if the offending vessel belonged to a private citizen. In ordinary cases, however, such a claim can not be enforced, because, for reasons of public policy, jurisdiction is withheld from the courts.

There has been a growing disposition of late years to give a general recognition to cases of damage from collisions and to treat them as essentially different from ordinary cases of negligence and wrongdoing on the part of Government agents, servants, and officials. This arises in part from the great power and authority which is necessarily given to an officer commanding a vessel, and it is argued, too, that when the Government mingles on terms of equality with others on the high seas and navigable inland waters the security of the citizen requires that the rules laid down for others should be observed by its own officers commanding its own vessels, and that these rules should be enforced against all alike, and that private persons should receive reparation for any injury done by their violation by officers of the United States.

In England the present practice is to file a libel in rem., upon which the court directs a letter to be written to the lords of the admiralty requesting an appearance on behalf of the Crown. This is generally given, and the case proceeds to judgment. It is insisted that the final decrees are little more than awards, so far as the Government is concerned, but the suits are instituted and conducted on the hypothesis that claims are created against the offending vessels by the collision, and it is presumed that the Government will satisfy a decree rendered by its own tribunals in a case in which it has voluntarily appeared.

Many in our own country have favored a general law for the trial of such cases in our courts, when the United States is alleged to be the offending party. Although no such law has ever been passed, the Government has, in many cases, by special laws and in appropriation acts, made provision for paying damages to those who have suffered loss from collisions when the vessel causing the injury belonged to the United States.

It is true that in the present case the findings of the Court of Claims do not have the same force as a judgment; but the claimant presented his case there with the permission of the Senate and in accordance with law. The United States was represented by an assistant of the Attorney-General and the case was duly defended, and a careful review of the findings shows that they are in accordance with the facts of the case so far as the party in fault is concerned.

After the matter has proceeded thus far with the consent of those who represented the Government, and who had authority under the law to act, the committee think that the claimant in this particular case should receive reimbursement for the damage which has resulted directly from the collision, without waiting for the enactment of a general law. The court finds that the cost of repairing the boat was $2,216.85, and that the actual loss in earnings while she was undergoing repairs was $3,000. These sums amount in the aggregate to $5,216.85, and the committee recommend the appropriation of this sum in full satisfaction of the claim.

The bill formerly recommended is in the same form as that now before the committee, and in this form it was passed by the Senate in the Fifty-second Congress, and again in the Fifty-third, and the committee, upon again considering the case, have reached the same conclusions as before, and recommend that the bill do pass.

ACCOUNT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FLORIDA.

The bill (S. 101) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the mutual account between the United States and the State of Florida, heretofore examined and stated by said Secretary under the authority of the Congress, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the mutual account, heretofore stated, between the United States and the State of Florida, under the authority of an act of Congress, according to the mode of stating the same, found near the foot of the third page of the letter of the Secretary submitting his report, dated December 16, 1889, published as Executive Document No. 68, House of Representatives, Fifty-first Congress, by continuing the computation of interest upon the principal on both sides to the date of settlement, and ascertaining the balance due the State, and to surrender to the governor of the State of Florida the bonds of the State held by the United States which are included in such statement, and proposes to appropriate such sum as may be necessary to pay to the State of Florida whatever balance is found due.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF D. FULFORD.

The bill (S. 1075) for the relief of the heirs of D. Fulford was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments. The first amendment was, in section 1, line 5, before the word "bonds," to strike out "four" and insert "two"; and in line 7, after the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty dollars, and fifty dollars"; so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, instructed to redeem, in favor of the heirs at law of D. Fulford, two bonds of the United States, consols of 1867, of the denomination of $500, $100, and known as five-twenties, said bonds having been destroyed by fire the 9th day of July, 1872, and to pay to the heirs at law of said D. Fulford the amount of said bonds, together with accrued interest from July 1, 1872, to the date of the maturity of said bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of section 2, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That as it appears from the records of the Treasury Department that there are now outstanding and unpaid a one-hundred-dollar coupon bond numbered 83482, and two five-hundred-dollar coupon bonds numbered 12792 and 34411, of the loan known as consols of 1867, of which the last coupon bears date of July 1, 1872, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to proceed against said bond of indemnity whenever said coupon bonds shall have been redeemed.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the said heirs of D. Fulford shall also execute and file with the Secretary of the Treasury a bond, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, in the penalty of $2,000, conditioned to save harmless the United States from loss or liability on account of said bonds or interest accrued thereon: Provided, That as it appears from the records of the Treasury Department that there are now outstanding and unpaid a one-hundred-dollar coupon bond numbered 83482 and two five-hundred-dollar coupon bonds numbered 12792 and 34411, of the loan known as consols of 1867, of which the last coupon bears date of July 1, 1872, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to proceed against said bond of indemnity whenever said coupon bonds shall have been redeemed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF GEORGE M'DOUGAL.

The bill (S. 621) for the relief of the legal representatives of George McDougal, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. I should like some explanation of that bill. It seems to provide for the payment of a claim the same as if it had been affirmed by a judgment of the Supreme Court. I do not know exactly what it means.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be passed over, the Senator reporting it not being present.

Mr. PLATT. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SUFFERERS BY EXPLOSION OF AMMUNITION CHEST.

The bill (S. 1205) for the relief of the persons who sustained damage by the explosion of an ammunition chest of Battery F, Second United States Artillery, July 16, 1894, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $15,845.23, being the sum found just by a board of officers convened at Chicago July 17, 1894, under Special Orders, No. 72, issued by command of Major-General Miles, of the Department of the Missouri, which sum is recommended by him, with the concurrence of the Major-General Commanding the Army, to pay the awards of the board, according to the following schedule, as set forth in their report, made on November 3, 1894, and published in Senate Executive Document No. 21, third session Fifty-third Congress, to wit: P. J. Ryan, $1,307; Charles R. Cave, $1,840.61; Edward C. Huling, $742.26; Jacob R. Custer, $717.83; Herman Lehman, $829.75; Herman Grossman, $770; Phillip W. Raber, $1,848.99; F. A. Devlin, lessee, $160; Samuel B. Foster, $1,699.50; Amelia H. Dodge, $1,495.84; Frederick A. Howe, $893.06; Hellen Palmer, $946.75; James Wright, $1,213.68; W. H. Godair, $258.04; J. W. Morrison, $47.77; Mrs. J. E. Ellen, $25; W. W. Morrill, $50; Silas H. Finch, $54.39; David Mayer, lessee, $45; Howlin Horgenroth, $125; H. N. Stephens, lessee, $12.55; John W. Byers, $105.33; Edward D. Murray, $100; Arthur W. Allen, $99.15; Emilie J. Smity, trustee, $19; T. A. Keene, $50; Hannah Sullivan, $40; Armory Warehouse Company, $18; W. F. Horn, agent, $25.91; Alice York, $305; total, $15,845.23.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MERIDEN, CONN.

The bill (S. 492) for the erection of a public building at Meriden, Conn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Meriden and State of Connecticut, the cost of the site and building, including vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed $100,000, which is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. JOHN B. READ.

The bill (S. 1491) for the relief of Dr. John B. Read was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $17,000 to pay Dr. John B. Read his claim as royalty on all rifle projectiles with iron sabots furnished to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF UNITED STATES PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (H. R. 6408) authorizing the sale of title of the United States to certain tracts of land in the District of Columbia to Margaret Shugrue, Caroline Lochboehler, and John R. Scott was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. I notice that the bill proposes that the sales shall be made provided the acquisition of title was not fraudulent. It seems to me it ought to say if the Secretary of War shall so find. There ought to be a finding of the fact; otherwise the title will always be in doubt.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The matter has been considered very carefully by the Secretary of War, and Colonel Elliott, who has had charge of it for a great many years, drew up the bill. It is drawn with a great deal of care.

Mr. HOAR. He has made a mistake in it, in my judgment. If the Senator will pardon me, I think I can satisfy him of that fact.

Mr. MCMILLAN. There is no objection to making such an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Lines 15, 16, and 17, on page 2, cover the point.

Mr. HOAR. I think it is a mistake, which was made in adding the proviso after the bill was originally drawn. This conveyance is to be made, provided the—

Secretary of War shall be of the opinion that the said sales will in no wise be detrimental to the Washington Aqueduct: Provided further, That the encroachments thereon were not fraudulent.

It is not that the Secretary shall be of that opinion also, but it makes the existence of that fact the condition.

At any time, according to the bill, this paper would be open to question by anybody who would raise the doubt. The bill ought to provide that the condition should be that the Secretary of War is of opinion so and so, so that his finding would be conclusive forever of the fact. If we strike out the words "Provided further" and insert the word "and," in line 17, it will remove the difficulty.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I have no objection to that change.

Mr. HOAR. I think, obviously, the way that happened was that the bill was first drawn without the proviso, and then it was put in without referring the question to the opinion of the Secretary of War, but making it an absolute condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 17, strike out the words "Provided further" and insert "and"; so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall be of the opinion that the said sales will in no wise be detrimental to the Washington Aqueduct and that the encroachments thereon were not fraudulent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. BAKER, and Mr. FAULKNER were appointed.

DISTRICT INSPECTORS OF PLUMBING.

The bill (S. 1707) defining the qualifications of chief inspector and deputy inspectors of plumbing in the District of Columbia was announced as the next business in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill go over under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being interposed, the bill will go over under Rule IX.

LICENSING OF BILLIARD AND POOL TABLES.

The bill (H. R. 5490) to license billiard and pool tables in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated.

Mr. BACON. I do not think there is a committee amendment. I think that is an amendment made in the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. It could not have been made in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BACON. It must be a mistake in the printing. Here is the report of the committee, which shows that fact. I can not account for it in any way except that the bill has been brought here and printed by the Senate just as it was reported to the House of Representatives by the House committee. I hold in my hand the report of the House committee, in which they speak of that very amendment as the one which they have reported to the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the bill be passed over for the present. We can go back to it.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I am satisfied it is not a Senate committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

LANDS FOR RESERVOIR SITES.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill which was passed over some time ago in my absence. It is Senate bill 264.

Mr. PEFFER. I do not like to object, especially in view of the Senator's absence, but I think we had better go on with the Calendar.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas that I should not have made the request if it were not a bill which has precedence on the Calendar. It is a bill that was passed over without prejudice, and therefore it has a right to be ahead of the other bills on the Calendar. I am not trying to break into the order of proceeding. It is ahead of these other bills, and it was passed over on account of my absence.

Mr. PEFFER. To-day?

Mr. PETTIGREW. No, sir; some time ago. I have a right to call it up, I suppose, under the rule. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not object under the circumstances.

Mr. PEFFER. Will it lead to any discussion?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I see no reason why it should lead to any debate. It is a brief measure.

Mr. PEFFER. I will withdraw my objection on condition that it leads to no discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 264) providing for the location and purchase of public lands for reservoir sites.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 8, after the word "have," to strike out the words "exclusive possession and"; and in the same line, after the word "reservoir," to insert "under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior"; and at the end of the section to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That such reservoir shall not be fenced and shall be open to the free use of any person desiring to water animals of any kind;

So as to make the section read:

That any person, live-stock company, or transportation corporation engaged in breeding, grazing, driving, or transporting live stock may construct reservoirs upon unoccupied public lands of the United States, not mineral or otherwise reserved, for the purpose of furnishing water to such live stock, and shall have control of such reservoir, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the lands upon which the same is constructed, not exceeding 160 acres, so long as such reservoir is maintained and water kept therein for such purposes: Provided, That such reservoir shall not be fenced and shall be open to the free use of any person desiring to water animals of any kind.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, in line 13, after the word "therein," to strike out:

Or such person, company, or corporation may enter and purchase the land upon which said reservoir is situated, as aforesaid, in tracts of not to exceed 160 acres, but such person, company, or corporation shall not be allowed to enter or purchase more than 10 tracts of land in any one county under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That before any person, company, or corporation shall be permitted to purchase land under this act a reservoir must have been maintained thereon and water kept therein at the proper season for at least two years prior to the date of final proof, which fact shall be established by at least two witnesses not relatives or employees; it must further be proven to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the United States land office in which such land is located that such reservoir is constructed in a permanent manner and of the capacity of not less than 100,000 gallons; that the waters therein have been used for the purposes mentioned in this act, and that all the requirements of this act have been complied with. Final proof shall be made within five years after filing the declaratory statement, and may be made in the same manner and place and upon like notice as is required in case of homestead entries, and upon the payment of the same fee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That upon completion of such reservoir the person, company, or corporation locating and constructing the same shall cause an accurate survey of such reservoir, and the land upon which the same is located and constructed, to be made and filed in the United States land office in and for the district in which such land is situated, and shall file therewith a statement of the capacity of such reservoir in gallons as constructed, and shall also set forth in what manner and of what material such reservoir has been constructed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the entries, in their exterior boundaries, under this act shall conform as nearly as possible to the Government subdivisions, but where that is impracticable in order to include ravines, gulches, draws, or other irregular-shaped natural excavations or basins, the exterior boundary lines of such entry may be located without reference to the Government subdivisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 4. That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not a copy of the bill, and I ask that it now be read as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person, live-stock company, or transportation corporation engaged in breeding, grazing, driving, or transporting live stock may construct reservoirs upon unoccupied public lands of the United States, not mineral or otherwise reserved, for the purpose of furnishing water to such live stock, and shall have control of such reservoir, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the lands upon which the same is constructed, not exceeding 160 acres, so long as such reservoir is maintained and water kept therein for such purpose: Provided, That such reservoir shall not be fenced and shall be open to the free use of any person desiring to water animals of any kind.

SEC. 2. That any person, live-stock company, or corporation desiring to avail themselves of the provisions of this act shall file a declaratory statement in the United States land office in the district where the land is situated, which statement shall describe the land where such reservoir is to be or has been constructed; shall state what business such corporation is engaged in; specify the capacity of the reservoir in gallons, and whether such company, person, or corporation has filed upon other reservoir sites within the same county; and if so, how many.

SEC. 3. That at any time after the completion of such reservoir or reservoirs which, if not completed at the date of the passage of this act, shall be constructed and completed within two years after filing such declaratory statement, such person, company, or corporation shall have the same accurately surveyed, as hereinafter provided, and shall file in the United States land office in the district in which such reservoir is located a map or plat showing the location of such reservoir, which map or plat shall be transmitted by the register and receiver of said United States land office to the Secretary of the Interior and approved by him, and thereafter such land shall be reserved from sale by the Secretary of the Interior so long as such reservoir is kept in repair and water kept therein.

SEC. 4. That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CROW AND FLATHEAD INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 1935) providing for a commission to negotiate with the Crow and Flathead Indians for the cession of portions of their respective reservations in the State of Montana was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to add the following as a new section:

SEC. 2. That the agreements made under the provisions of this act shall provide that a certain sum of money shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, out of which to pay the taxes upon all inalienable allotments of lands to said Indians during the time said allotments are inalienable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN ALABAMA, MISSISSIPPI, AND ARKANSAS.

The bill (H. R. 1244) to confirm certain cash entries of offered lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF BOND SALES.

Mr. HILL. I suggest that the next three orders of business, the resolution providing for an investigation into sales of United States bonds in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896, the resolution as to the claimant to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware, and the bill (S. 2147) establishing additional regulations concerning immigration to the United States, go over. Each of them will lead to some debate.

Mr. PEFFER. I move, notwithstanding the Senator's objection, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by me on the 12th of February, providing for a committee of five Senators to investigate and report generally all the material facts and circumstances connected with the sale of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896. We had it before the Senate twice on two different days and we had an opportunity then to discuss the resolution. I do not see why we might not as well take it up now, unless we can procure unanimous consent to set a particular time when it may be considered. I would not object to that course.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the Senator from Kansas asking for? We can not hear him on this side.

Mr. PEFFER. Order of Business 332 was called, and the Senator from New York objected to its present consideration. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. HILL. I suggested that the next three measures on the Calendar should go over, as each of them would lead to debate. I thought it would expedite business. It is no use to take up those matters now.

Mr. FRYE. Unanimous consent was given to proceed with the Calendar of unobjected cases under the five-minute rule. I do not think the Senator from Kansas can, under that agreement, make the motion which he proposes to make.

Mr. HOAR. Does that unanimous-consent agreement last forever?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that any Senator can move to take up a measure from the Calendar without violating such a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. TELLER. That is done a hundred times.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is always done.

Mr. COCKRELL. It can be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But if objected to, a Senator can move to proceed with its consideration. It has been done repeatedly during the short time I have been in the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. That is done when we proceed with the Calendar under the ordinary rule.

Mr. PEFFER. My motion is to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HILL. I will raise the question whether under the existing status the motion of the Senator from Kansas is in order.

Mr. COCKRELL (to Mr. HILL). Object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HILL. I object, then.

Mr. TELLER. The motion to take up must certainly be in order. There can not be any question about that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My impression about the present status is that unanimous consent was asked that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar. A number of Senators have gone away from the Chamber under the impression that that would be the order for the remainder of the day. I came very near going myself, believing that nothing whatever would be done except that cases unobjected to would be taken up. When a unanimous-consent agreement of that sort has been given in the Senate it seems to me that it would be a violation of it for any Senator afterwards to move to proceed to the consideration of any business objected to.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is objected to.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean that we should spend the whole day on the Calendar? I should like to have the unanimous-consent agreement read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understood it to be the agreement that we would spend the afternoon on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that is a very proper appeal to make to the Senate, but it does not raise the question that we can not move to take up the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I rose for the purpose of asking the Senator from Kansas not to insist on taking it up, as we had agreed to proceed to the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. That might be persuasive, but the motion can not be held to be out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that under the rule a motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution is in order unless there has been some agreement on the part of the Senate that such a motion shall not be made.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I make a suggestion to the Senator from Kansas? I suggest that he ask unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of this resolution to-morrow. It has had a most remarkable career. We were all apparently in favor of it. The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] brought in a resolution to take its place, which was less drastic than this resolution, and it was defeated by an overwhelming majority. From that day to this neither the Senator from Kansas nor anybody else has been able to get up a resolution inquiring into these bond sales, and finally the Senator from Kansas, with that patience which characterizes him, has waited until finally the business of the Senate has rolled around until it has reached it; and now the Senator from New York objects.

Mr. HILL. It had better keep rolling, then.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In a moment, if the Senator from New York will pardon me. Now it will go over again until some other afternoon, when it will drift along, and when we come to it somebody else will object or it will not come within the unanimous-consent agreement. I ask the Senator from New York if he is not inclined to agree that we shall at least fix upon some time when this measure may be discussed and the Senate will give him an hour? I apprehend the Senator from Kansas is not insistent upon this afternoon.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Utah had the right of way this afternoon. The Arkansas bill was disposed of more quickly than had been anticipated, and he would have moved that bill, except that unexpectedly the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] was absent, and of course he allowed it to go over. Then we proceeded to take up the Calendar. I have not known any case where we proceeded to the consideration of the Calendar and an objection was raised that we stopped then to enter on a fight upon the question of taking up a bill for consideration. This resolution will lead to considerable debate; in the language of the Senator from Maine, a brief debate. It can not be taken up very well this afternoon, but at any time when the Senate wants to enter upon this subject and we shall not be cut off by the morning hour, as I have been twice, I have no objection to proceeding with it. But I want to know the time a little in advance. I have not my papers here or anything else, and I certainly shall not proceed if I can help it this afternoon.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he will agree upon some time to-morrow when the resolution may be called up?

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] has notified us that to-morrow we shall have to proceed with the Du Pont case. Then another Senator notified us that an appropriation bill will be ready for to-morrow. Any time you can set to take it up and proceed with it until it is disposed of will be all right.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that there is a speech or two to be made to-morrow. Will the Senator accept the next day; that is, Wednesday?

Mr. HILL. What hour do you want to fix it for?

Mr. TELLER. Two o'clock. Would that suit the Senator?

Mr. PEFFER. Fifteen minutes after 2.

Mr. TELLER. Or fifteen minutes after 2.

Mr. HILL. I wish to make another suggestion to the Senator. I introduced a resolution some time ago and the Senate passed one requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the Senate a list of the bidders and certain facts in connection with the transaction, and I had supposed that it had been answered. I find that it has not. I want a copy of that information. I prefer not to proceed with the debate until that report has been made. I do not know why the delay is that it has not yet been produced. I want that information before we proceed with the discussion.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator that he could get that to-morrow without any trouble if we do not take up the resolution until the next day. He can certainly get the information to-morrow.

Mr. HILL. The report has not been made.

Mr. TELLER. A telegram sent to the Department this afternoon will bring it to-morrow, I have not any doubt.

Mr. WOLCOTT. A suggestion was made by my colleague which possibly the Senator from New York did not understand. It is that we fix upon day after to-morrow.

Mr. PEFFER. At half past 2 day after to-morrow.

Mr. WOLCOTT. At any time on that day, so that we can agree to take up the resolution.

Mr. PLATT. I believe I will object to any unanimous-consent arrangement.

Mr. GORMAN. So would I.

Mr. PLATT. Agreements are made here in a thin Senate, and we have a great deal of trouble with them when the Senate is full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to serve notice upon the Senator from Connecticut that we will take the resolution up, if a majority of the Senate vote for it; and we shall take it up very soon, too, if we do not do so to-day.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senate is not too thin, we will take it up now. I understand that the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] is before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not insist upon that course. It will simply be a waste of time to attempt that now. The Senator well knows the resolution can be taken up at any time; there is no trouble about that; but you do not want it taken up when it would be simply a waste of time and not accomplish anything. That is the point I make. There are plenty of votes here to take up the resolution whenever you want to bring it before the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection whatever that a motion should be made now or at any time to take up the resolution. have no objection to the resolution, but I simply desire to exercise a privilege which one Senator has not to make agreements by unanimous consent that we shall proceed at a fixed time to the consideration of a certain measure and find when the time comes that it is very inconvenient.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say one word before the discussion proceeds any further, because there seems to be a misapprehension certainly on the part of the Senator from New York. The Calendar, under Rule VIII, is the regular order immediately after the routine business every morning. If nothing intervenes the Calendar is taken up after the morning business and you commence with the cases where you left off on the last consideration. Then any motion to proceed to the consideration of a resolution or bill on the Calendar is clearly in order, notwithstanding an objection may be made. But we are proceeding with the Calendar exceptionally to-day, under a unanimous request made that we might proceed to consider the unobjected cases. To-morrow morning, after the routine business is completed, the Calendar is in order, and the first business on it is the resolution of the Senator from Kansas. All that he has then to do is to ask that we proceed or move that we proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and that resolution comes up; and if anyone makes an objection, a motion can at once be made to proceed to the consideration of the resolution notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The explanation of the Senator from Maine is as lucid as a well, but the misapprehension arises from the fact that there was a unanimous-consent agreement that we should proceed to the consideration of the Calendar. In the minds of many of us here that was not intended to last any specific length of time. It was early in the afternoon when it was agreed to, and many of us have been looking along hoping that when this resolution was reached in due course it would receive consideration. We apprehended, and very naturally, that no Senator would object, and that we would bring it before the Senate. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that if there is Calendar business to be transacted this afternoon, he give notice that he will move to take up the resolution to-morrow at some time, perhaps after the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. The resolution does not happen to be casually objected to, I do not mean by the Senator from New York, but I mean its progress is not casually objected to. It has been shoved over day after day and day after day, and something has always happened why we should not consider the investigation of the bond measure. In my opinion and in the opinion, I know, of very many Senators the time of the Senate could be just as well taken up in the discussion of the question of the sale of the bonds and of the policy of the Government which led to them as in discussing many of the abstract propositions which have taken the time of the Senate for many days in the past few weeks.

Mr. PEFFER. I think we can obviate all this difficulty by a simple notice. I give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Missouri to withhold that motion for one moment. I want to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to call up a bill authorizing the extension of a right of way to build a railroad in the Indian Territory. It will take but a few minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it a House or a Senate bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is a House bill.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose the notice of the Senator from Kansas, that he will move to take up the resolution, will not interfere with the unfinished business which is set for to-morrow.

Mr. FRYE. That comes up at 2 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. No notice can interfere with the regular order.

INTEROCEANIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5914) to amend an act to authorize the Interoceanic Railway Company to construct and operate railway, telegraph, and telephone lines through the Indian Territory.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield temporarily until that can be disposed of.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 154) to provide for the erection of a public building at Indianapolis, Ind.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in section 2, line 4, after the word "two," to insert "purchase, at a cost not exceeding $200,000, 15,200 square feet of ground adjoining the present site, and to"; and in lines 9 and 10, after the word "buildings," to insert "with the additional ground purchased"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, it shall be deemed in the best interest and economy of the public service, he is hereby authorized and directed, in lieu of the provisions of section 1 of this act, to purchase, at a cost not exceeding $200,000, 15,200 square feet of ground adjoining the present site, and to cause the present United States court-house and post-office and other buildings to be torn down and removed, and to cause to be erected on the site of said buildings, with the additional ground purchased, a new public building for the use and accommodation of the Government offices, upon sketch plans, drawings, and detailed estimates to be prepared and approved as specified in said section 1 of this act, at a cost not exceeding said sum of $2,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESTRUCTION OF INCOME-TAX RETURNS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (H. Res. 24) providing for the immediate destruction of income-tax returns, and so forth. It is a measure reported by the Finance Committee unanimously, and it will take but a moment for its consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAURICE RIVER LIGHT-HOUSE, ETC.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask leave to call up the bill (H. R. 55) for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal station at or near Big Oyster Bed Shoal, New Jersey.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in line 3, after the word "that," to strike out "a light-house and fog-signal station" and insert "range lights and keeper's quarters"; and in line 4, after the word "near," to strike out "Big Oyster Bed Shoal, mouth of the" and insert "the entrance to"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That range lights and keeper's quarters be established at or near the entrance to Maurice River, Delaware Bay, New Jersey: Provided, That the same shall not cost more than $4,500.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the establishment of a light-house and fog-signal station at or near the entrance to Maurice River, New Jersey."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3292) granting an honorable discharge to Seth Porter Church, alias Samuel Church, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOSEPH W. FISHER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to furnish the House with a certified engrossed copy of the bill (S. 640) to increase the pension of Joseph W. Fisher, to replace the original engrossed copy, which had been lost; and, by unanimous consent, the request was complied with.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 31, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 30, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to a matter in connection with the RECORD which places me in rather an awkward position. At the evening session on Friday last, speaking of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I used language which I now read from the RECORD:

They have brought in a measure here that, in the main and practically in all respects, is a most valuable step forward in this matter of pensions, and I am not willing to be a member of a House, or a member of a political party, or a member of a committee, and stand by and hear an advantage taken that I know is not a fair advantage—

And then I went on to say—

even though my doing so might inure to the benefit of some "fugleman," as somebody on this floor has been very politely called to-night—some fugleman of some candidate for the Presidency. I suppose we have a good many fuglemen here. I imagine that the gentleman who made the charge is a sort of a fugleman, possibly not a major-general, possibly only a corporal, but I think he will fugle some before he gets through. [Laughter.]

Now, if there was nothing to justify or provoke the use of that language, I am placed in the position of using expressions that under ordinary circumstances I should not use. The fact, however, is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY], in his remarks preceding what I said, had used this language:

But, sir, we are so busy making Presidents—this Congress is filled up with so many candidates for the Presidency, so many fuglemen for other candidates.

It was in response to that remark of the gentleman from Illinois that I used the language which I have quoted; but for some reason or other—God only knows what it is—the gentleman's remark does not appear in the printed RECORD, so that I am left in the position of having made a slash at something that does not appear to exist. As the thing stands in the RECORD, it looks as if I had originated this word "fugleman" and was playing upon it and charging it upon the gentleman from Illinois, whereas in fact he first introduced the expression, though his printed remarks do not show that fact.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Ohio has referred to me and to something that I said at the last Friday night's session, I wish to state that whatever appears in the RECORD as having been said by me is just what the Official Reporters took down. If there is any mistake about it, it is not mine, for I have not changed a word or a letter. I certainly did not presume to charge that the gentleman from Ohio was a "fugleman" for any candidate for the Presidency. That, of course, could not be presumed for one moment from any remark of mine. Whatever appears in the RECORD is just what the Official Reporter took down. I have not been here long enough to learn the trick of changing what I say on the floor with my pencil after I have said it. What I say here I am willing to stand by.

Mr. GROSVENOR. All I can say is that the gentleman did use the words that I have attributed to him.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Then the gentleman should assail the reporter, and not me.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not "assail" anybody. I am defending myself for having used language that is senseless, in view of the condition of the RECORD. That is all.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I suppose the apology will be received. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following public business. [Laughter.]

DULUTH AND NORTH DAKOTA RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4254) granting to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. JENKINS. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table,

JOSEPH W. FISHER.

Mr. ANDREWS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to transmit to the House a certified engrossed copy of the bill (S. 640) entitled "An act to increase the pension of Joseph W. Fisher," to replace the original engrossed copy, which has been lost.

GOOD FAITH WITH THE INDIANS.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorial of the legislature of the State of Mississippi, which I send to the desk.

The memorial was read in part, when

Mr. DINGLEY said: I think it is unnecessary to have this paper read. I suppose there will be no objection to printing it in the RECORD, as it is a memorial of a State legislature.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the memorial will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The memorial is as follows:

Memorial of the legislature of the State of Mississippi to the Congress of the United States.

Whereas the State of Mississippi is composed largely of the lands ceded by the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations of Indians, by solemn treaties made by said Indians with the United States, by which said Indians acquired in exchange therefor the lands on which they now live in the Indian Territory; and

Whereas the Chickasaw Indians ceded all that part of our State from the Tombigbee on the east to the Mississippi River on the west, and the Choctaws ceded all that part of our State from the Alabama line on the east to the Mississippi River on the west and to the Gulf coast on the south; and

Whereas the Five Civilized Tribes, the Chickasaws, Choctaws, Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles, have ceded vast empires of lands to the Government of the United States, out of which State after State has been carved, and have received in exchange for this vast domain, by solemn treaties and formal letters patent, what is known as the Indian Territory, west of the Mississippi River; and

Whereas there is an effort now being made before your honorable bodies to virtually strip the five nations of Indians of the land thus solemnly conveyed to them, to destroy the autonomy of their respective governments, fashioned, as they all are, on the Constitution and Government of our own States, we respectfully memorialize your respective bodies to keep honorable faith with these weak nations, and in aid of our prayer and memorial beg leave earnestly to call the attention of the Congress of the United States to the terms of the treaties solemnly entered into with these Five Civilized Tribes of Indians.

In the year 1830 the United States Government announced its policy of removing the Indian tribes then located east of the Mississippi River to west of the river by an exchange of lands, and authorized the President, by an act of Congress passed on the 28th day of May, 1830—

"To assure the tribe or nation with which the exchange is made that the United States will forever secure and guarantee to them and their heirs and successors the country so exchanged with them; and if they prefer it the United States will cause a patent or grant to be made to them for the same: Provided always, That such lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon same."

And by treaty made on the 14th day of February, 1833, the Government of the United States, by authorized commission, guaranteed their present home to the Cherokees (and all the other tribes), in the words following:

"ARTICLE 1. The United States agree to possess the Cherokees (and same terms apply to the other tribes), and to guarantee it to them forever, and that guaranty is hereby pledged, of 7,000,000 acres of land, to be bounded as follows (and here land is described), which includes the land now owned and occupied by the Cherokees, and letters patent shall be issued by the United States as soon as practicable for the land hereby guaranteed."

By treaty of December 29, 1835, the United States confirmed the grant and renewed the pledge of a patent in the following words:

"ART. 3. The United States also agrees that the lands above ceded by the treaty of February 14, 1823, including the 'Outlet' and those ceded by this treaty, the so-called 'neutral' lands, shall all be included in one patent, executed to the Cherokee Nation of Indians by the President of the United States, according to the act of May 28, 1830."

This patent was issued December 31, 1839, and conveyed the lands to the Cherokee Nation, their heirs and successors, "to hold forever."

By treaty of August 17, 1846, the United States further declared:

"ART. 1. That the lands now occupied by the Cherokee Nation shall be secured to the whole Cherokee people for their common use and benefit."

By the treaty of 1835, sections 5, 6, and 7, all these grants of lands were solemnly confirmed, and so anxious was the Government of the United States to secure these lands lying within the limits of the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, and Tennessee, and to remove the Five Civilized Tribes to the west of the Mississippi River, that they agreed by the seventh article of the treaty of 1835 to grant to the Indian tribes, should they desire it, a delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States.

At the close of the war between the States, the Cherokees and Chickasaws having raised regiments and taken sides with the Confederates, it became necessary to make new treaties, to define the relation of the Indian nation to the United States, and by the treaty of 1866, made after the close of the war, it was provided—

"ART. 26. The United States guarantee to the people of the Cherokee Nation (and same provision applied to all the Five Civilized Tribes) the quiet and peaceable possession of their country, and protection against domestic feuds and insurrections, and against hostilities of other tribes. They shall also be protected from interruption and intrusion from all unauthorized citizens of the United States who may attempt to settle on their land or reside in their territory.

"ART. 27. All persons not in the military service of the United States not citizens of the nation are to be prohibited from coming into the Cherokee Nation, or remaining in the same, except as herein otherwise provided; and it is the duty of the United States Indian agent of the Cherokees to have such persons not lawfully residing or sojourning therein removed from the nation, as they now are or hereafter may be required by the Indian intercourse laws of the United States.

TREATY OF 1866.

"ART. 7. The Choctaws and Chickasaws agree to such legislation as Congress and the President of the United States may deem necessary for the better administration of justice and the protection of the rights of person and property within the Indian Territory; provided, however, such legislation shall not in any wise interfere with or annul their present tribal organization, or their respective legislatures or judiciaries, or the rights, laws, privileges, or customs of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively.

"ART. 10. The United States reaffirms all obligations arising out of treaty stipulations or acts of legislature with regard to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations extending prior to the late rebellion and in force at that time not inconsistent herewith; and further agrees to renew the payment of all annuities and other moneys accruing under such treaty stipulation and acts of legislation from and after the close of the fiscal year ending on the 30th day of June, in the year 1866."

It will thus be seen that by every treaty stipulation between the United States and the Indian tribes from 1830 to 1866 the right to govern themselves and to hold their lands in common was most solemnly guaranteed.

Now it is proposed to do away with these governments, all republican, and closely modeled after the Government of the United States and the State constitutions and governments, and to force them, against the most solemn treaty stipulations, to hold their lands in severalty.

It must be remembered that these Indians were asked to give up their homes, and the homes of their wives and children, and the graves of their ancestors, and seek new homes in the then wilds of the West. All this they did for the whites. The love and reverence of the Chickasaws for the homes they left behind them is shown by the fact that in naming the counties of the Nation they took the names of the old counties they left behind. They have their Tishomingo, Choctaw, Pontotoc, as we have. The Indians gave up their homes with fear and dread; but when the brave old hero whom they had learned to honor and respect (for he never spoke to them "with a forked tongue") said to them in their own beautiful and figurative language, "This land shall be yours as long as the grass grows and the water flows," they yielded, and sought a new home in the Western wilds, and have become a civilized and prosperous people. Shall our own Government go back on the word of the hero of New Orleans? While our Government is demanding that there shall be no dismembering of the territory of far-distant Venezuela, and proclaiming its advocacy of the far-distant Christians of Armenia and its horror of the Turkish barbarism which oppresses them, shall we go back on our plighted faith to the weak Indian nations in our very midst, who have yielded to the white man an empire of lands, the richest and most fertile on the globe? Shall we tarnish the honor and bright fame of our Government by keeping punic faith with the weak and the helpless?

We ask that you keep faith with these tribes, and break not the solemn treaties by which you have agreed to let them have their own government and conduct their own affairs.

Be it resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That a copy of this memorial, signed by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house, and attested by the secretary of state, with the great seal of the State attached, be forwarded to each of our Senators and each of our Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Passed the house March 3, 1896.

Speaker of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 6248) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. R. 114) authorizing and directing Bernard R. Green to exercise the duties and powers heretofore conferred upon the late Gen. Thomas L. Casey in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following bills and joint resolutions were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 2629) to provide for the erection of a public building at Washington, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Joint resolution (S. R. 110) providing for the appointment of a commission, under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the preliminary survey, with plans, specifications, and approximate estimates of cost thereof, for the construction of a ship canal of approved width and depth from the lower shore of Lake Michigan to the Wabash River, and for the further investigation of the practicability of the construction of such waterway—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

A bill (S. 2546) concerning the court of appeals in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 2346) to prescribe the times and places of holding the district court of the United States in and for the District of Alaska—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 676) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Joint resolution (S. R. 107) to authorize Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, and Prof. Asaph Hall, United States Navy, to accept decorations from the Government of the Republic of France—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

A bill (S. 1724) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Black River, in Louisiana—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A bill (S. 1872) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange in behalf of the United States the tract of land at Choctaw Point, Mobile County, Ala., now belonging to the United States and held for light-house purposes, with the Mobile, Jackson and Kansas City Railroad Company for any other tract or parcel of land in said county equally well or better adapted for use for light-house purposes—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A bill (S. 2609) to amend chapter 341, section 9, of the acts of 1885, so far as the same prescribes the punishment of death for Indians committing the offense of rape—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Joint resolution (S. R. 116) authorizing the Public Printer to print the Annual Report of the Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in quarto form and to bind it in one volume—to the Committee on Printing.

Concurrent resolution—

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the report of the special agent for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska for the year 1894, 6,000 copies; 1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the Treasury Department—

To the Committee on Printing.

FREDERICK B. BETTS.

Mr. PITNEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4632) for the relief of Frederick B. Betts, surviving partner of the firm of Betts, Nichols & Co.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Frederick B. Betts, surviving partner of the firm of Betts, Nichols & Co., out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250, being the amount of Treasury draft No. 5453, on Treasury interior warrant No. 4801, dated March 1, 1861, and drawn upon the assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans in favor of Lampson & Hendricks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to have the gentleman make some explanation. It was almost impossible to understand the bill as read.

Mr. PITNEY. I will explain the bill, or will have the report read, as the gentleman may prefer.

Several MEMBERS. Explain it.

Mr. PITNEY. In 1861, just before the outbreak of the war, a draft was issued by the assistant treasurer of the United States at Washington upon the subtreasury at New Orleans, payable to order of the firm of Sampson & Hendricks, who were merchants in Austin, Tex. It was passed by Sampson & Hendricks to the New York firm of Betts, Nichols & Co., in payment of an obligation previously incurred.

About the time that the draft was sent to New York the war commenced, and mail intercourse was suspended, so that the New York firm could not send the draft to New Orleans for presentation at the subtreasury there. They kept it until the close of the war and then mailed it to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, stating that they desired the draft paid, but did not know whether it should be presented at New Orleans, and asking advice from him as to how payment could be obtained. Owing to some oversight the Secretary of the Treasury pigeonholed the draft, and it was kept at the Department from that time until now, the letters in regard to it never having been answered. Thus payment has been prevented until the present time. The claim is a perfectly proper one.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has there been any call upon the Treasury Department for an explanation of the circumstances.

Mr. PITNEY. There has been. And I have submitted to the Committee on Claims the original letters. I have copies here.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman kindly have them read? He speaks of letters having been "pigeonholed"; and I think that in connection with such an accusation the defense of the Department ought to come in.

Mr. PITNEY. Well, there are a number of the letters.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Have them read, and I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. PITNEY. All right, sir; I ask the Clerk to read the communications which I send to the desk. The report, however, sets out the matter quite fully. I send a copy of it also to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOODARD, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4632) for the relief of Frederick B. Betts, surviving partner of the firm of Betts, Nichols & Co., respectfully report:

That they have carefully considered the said bill, and report it back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This is a claim for the payment of Treasury draft No. 5453, issued on Treasury Interior warrant No. 4801, dated March 1, 1861, drawn on the subtreasury at New Orleans in favor of Sampson & Hendricks, for $250. The consideration of the draft was the rent of rooms for the United States courts at Austin, Tex., for three months ending December 20, 1860. Shortly after receiving the draft, and on or about April 4, 1861, Sampson & Hendricks transferred it in the ordinary course of business to Messrs. Betts, Nichols & Co., of New York City, in payment of a debt incurred prior to January 1, 1861. The draft was received from Sampson & Hendricks in Austin, Tex., by the collecting agent of the New York firm. It reached the latter firm in New York about May 10, 1861, just after the commencement of the war, when it was too late to send the draft from New York to New Orleans for presentation at the subtreasury there for payment. Messrs. Betts, Nichols & Co. therefore retained the draft in their possession until after the close of the war, and then (January 2, 1866) sent it to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington with a letter explaining that by reason of the war they had been unable to present it to the assistant treasurer at New Orleans, the letter closing with these words:

"Not knowing whether there is now an assistant treasurer at New Orleans, we inclose it to you for payment or advice what to do with the same."

This letter, inclosing the draft, was duly received by the Secretary of the Treasury, but no answer was ever made to the letter, and the draft was retained in the Treasury Department from that day to this, and has never been paid.

On May 18, 1866, Betts, Nichols & Co. wrote again to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, but received no reply.

On June 13, 1870, they wrote again to the Treasury Department, and were informed by letter from the First Auditor that, as the draft was outstanding prior to April 13, 1861, it would be necessary for the holders to prove—

"That the original owners of the draft, Sampson & Hendricks, and all other persons who have had, or who may now have, any interest in said draft, did not promote, encourage, or in any manner sustain the late rebellion, and were distinctly known during said rebellion to be opposed thereto and in favor of its suppression."

Betts, Nichols & Co. were unable to furnish the required proof with reference to Sampson & Hendricks.

These requirements were imposed by a joint resolution approved March 2, 1867 (Rev. Stat., sec. 3480). No such obstacle stood in the way of the payment of the draft when it was sent to the Treasury in January, 1866, nor did any other legal obstacle then exist.

The joint resolution of 1867 is, in our opinion, unconstitutional and void, at least so far as a claim of this character is concerned. The Constitution prohibits the passage by Congress of any bill of attainder or ex post facto law. Your committee think that the joint resolution in question, in so far as it would operate to deprive Messrs. Betts, Nichols & Co., without a judicial trial, of property worth $250, for alleged offenses committed by a third party previous to the passage of the resolution, is manifestly unconstitutional.

The Treasury draft under consideration was a good and valid obligation of the United States Treasury at the time it was received by Betts, Nichols & Co., and we think it is so still. Consequently, it ought to be paid without further delay.

F. B. Betts is the sole surviving partner of Betts, Nichols & Co., and entitled to collect the assets of the said firm, including this draft.

The claim is an old one, but that is not the fault of the claimant. At frequent intervals since the adverse action of the Treasury Department in 1870 Congress has been petitioned to grant relief in the matter.

A bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the claim passed the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress, and again in the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses. In each instance it failed of consideration in the House, although in the Fifty-second Congress it was favorably reported by the House Committee on Claims.

SIR: We hand you the inclosed Treasury warrant, dated Washington, March 1, 1861, payable to and indorsed by Sampson & Henricks, of Austin, Tex., on assistant treasurer United States at New Orleans for $250.

This was taken by our young man in winter of 1861 while in Austin, Tex., and before it reached us the war commenced, and we were unable to get it to present to assistant treasurer at New Orleans.

Not knowing whether there is now an assistant treasurer at New Orleans, we inclose it to you for payment or advice what to do with the same.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

BETTS, NICHOLS & CO.

Hon. HUGH MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of Treasury United States, Washington, D. C.

117 BROADWAY, New York, June 13, 1870.

SIR: On the 2d of January, 1866, we addressed a letter to the Hon. Hugh McCulloch, the then Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing Treasury warrant dated Washington, March 1, 1861, payable to and indorsed by Sampson & Henricks, of Austin, Tex., on assistant treasurer United States at New Orleans for $250. This was taken by our young man in winter of 1861 while in Austin, Tex., and before it reached us the war commenced, and we were unable to get it to present to assistant treasurer at New Orleans.

Again we addressed the Department under date of May 18, 1866. To neither of our letters have we ever received a reply. Will you have the goodness to answer, and let us know if we can expect its payment?

Yours, truly,

BETTS, NICHOLS & CO.

Hon. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury United States, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
June 20, 1870.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 13th instant, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, having been referred to this office, I caused a search to be made of the letter of January 2, 1866, therein referred to, and found from the records of the Secretary's Office that it had been referred, with the draft inclosed, to the Comptroller of the Treasury on the 4th of January, 1870, and upon application to that office the letter and draft have been referred to this office for its proper action. As this draft was outstanding and unpaid prior to April 13, 1861, it will be necessary for you to furnish satisfactory proof that the original owners of the draft, Sampson & Hendricks, and all other persons who have had or who may now have any interest in said draft did not promote, encourage, or in any manner sustain the late rebellion, and were distinctly known during said rebellion to be opposed thereto and in favor of its suppression.

Very respectfully, etc.,

T. S. SMITH, Auditor.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1896.

SIR: In reply to your verbal request of this date, I have the honor to state that an account was stated in the name of Sampson & Hendricks, per First Auditor's report No. 13216, for rent of rooms for the United States courts at Austin, Tex., for the three months ending December 20, 1860. Treasury warrant No. 4801 was issued, and on this warrant a draft was issued as follows:

No. 5453. Treasury warrant No. 4801.

$250. INTERIOR.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES.

WASHINGTON, March 1, 1861.

At sight, pay to Sampson & Hendricks, or order, two hundred and fifty dollars ^{100}.

WM. B. RANDOLPH,
Acting Treasurer of the United States.

No. 5453. Registered March 1, 1861. $250.

F. BIGGER, Register of the Treasury.

ASSISTANT TREASURER UNITED STATES,
New Orleans, La.

(Indorsed): Sampson & Hendricks.

On January 2, 1866, this draft was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury by Betts, Nichols & Co. On June 13, 1870, Betts, Nichols & Co. again wrote to the Secretary in regard to said draft. On June 20, 1870, the First Auditor wrote to Betts, Nichols & Co., stating that it would be necessary to prove the loyalty of the payees and of other persons who had had an interest in the draft, to and including the present holders. On June 21, 1870, Betts, Nichols & Co. wrote to the Auditor setting forth the following facts:

"Our young man, now dead, was in Texas in 1860 and 1861 collecting for us. Sampson & Hendricks, Austin, Tex., bought goods from us, and our young man settled with them for bill of goods sold October 30, 1860, and took from them this Treasury draft in payment.

"This settlement was made on the 4th of April, 1861, and the draft did not reach us until after the 13th of April, 1861, and we then were unable to send it to New Orleans for collection. We do not suppose it is in our power to furnish you satisfactory proof that Sampson & Hendricks were not engaged in the rebellion; we take it for granted they were. Of this we do not know. Now, at this writing, we do not know their residence. The Treasury draft is our sole property, and we are the only party from whom you want information. On this point we can satisfy you and the Department, and as we are the sole owners of the draft and as it came into our hands in the course of legitimate business we presume on your being satisfied about us is all that will be required for its payment."

On June 22, 1870, the First Auditor wrote to Betts, Nichols & Co. that the requirements of his letter of the 20th must be complied with before payment of the draft could be made.

The original draft, of which a copy is given herein, is now on file in my office.

Respectfully, yours,

R. M. COUSAR, Acting Auditor.

Hon. M. PITNEY, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 20, 1896.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 18th instant, I inclose herewith copy of letter of Betts, Nichols & Co., to Hon. Hugh McCulloch, dated January 2, 1866, also copy of letter from Betts, Nichols & Co. to Hon. George S. Boutwell, dated June 13, 1870.

In reply to your request for information as to what obstacle existed to the payment of the draft at the time it was presented, I would state that on January 2, 1866, at the time that this draft was forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment, there was no appropriation available to pay the same. The appropriation for payment of outstanding liabilities was made May 2, 1866 (see sections 306, 307, and 308, Rev. Stat.). From May 3, 1866, to March 2, 1867, the date of the act prohibiting payment of claims of this character, I do not know of any reason why this draft should not have been paid. It was held in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, however, from January 2, 1866, to June 13, 1870, without any action being taken in regard to the claim, so far as I have any knowledge.

Respectfully, yours,

R. M. COUSAR, Acting Auditor.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1896.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 23d instant, making further inquiry in regard to the claim of Betts, Nichols & Co., I have the honor to state that the papers on file in this office fail to show that any reply was made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the letter of Betts, Nichols & Co., dated January 2, 1866. On inquiry in the office of the Secretary I can find no record of any communication to Betts, Nichols & Co. in reply to said letter. There is no record in this office or in the Department, so far as I can learn, of the receipt of the letter of Betts, Nichols & Co. of date of May 18, 1866.

In further reply to your inquiry I would state that draft No. 5453 on Treasury warrant No. 4801, dated March 1, 1861, in favor of Sampson & Hendricks for $250, drawn on the assistant treasurer United States, New Orleans, La., and indorsed Sampson & Hendricks, has not been paid.

Respectfully, yours,

R. M. COUSAR, Acting Auditor.

Hon. MAHLON PITNEY, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

Before the reading of the above was concluded,

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied with what has been read. I ask that the remaining communications be printed in the RECORD, to accompany the bill. I make no objection to the present consideration of the bill. I believe it to be correct, from what I can gather.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move a formal amendment, to change in the last line of the bill the word "Lampson" to "Sampson." It is a misprint in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PITNEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BERNARD R. GREEN.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk Senate joint resolution No. 114, authorizing and directing Bernard R. Green to exercise the duties and powers heretofore conferred upon the late Gen. Thomas L. Casey in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress, and ask its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Bernard R. Green be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to assume and exercise all of the duties and powers heretofore conferred by law upon the late Brig. Gen. Thomas L. Casey, in relation to the construction and completion of the Library of Congress, and he shall receive as compensation for his services the sum of $5,000 per annum, payable out of the appropriations for said Library building: Provided, That all expenses incurred in the prosecuting of said work, including compensation of employees, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MILES. I would like some explanation before consent is given.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, this resolution simply appoints the successor to General Casey, who has been his chief assistant in the completion of the Library building.

The haste in the passage of the resolution grows out of the fact that we are approaching the end of the month, and it will be very unfortunate for a great many people whose compensation depends on the signature of the superintendent of construction unless we can pass the resolution before the first of the month.

Mr. MILES. Is it not unusual to make an appointment of this character by joint resolution?

Mr. QUIGG. It may be unusual, but we appointed General Casey. This is the Library of Congress, and the appointment is necessary, in order that there may be a superintendent in charge of the work.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. QUIGG. With pleasure.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman from Maryland that a clause was attached, I believe, to the sundry civil appropriation bill, either of the last Congress or the preceding one, continuing General Casey in charge of the work, notwithstanding that he may have been retired.

Mr. QUIGG. Precisely.

Mr. SAYERS. Now General Casey is dead, and it is intended that this gentleman, who is familiar with the progress of the work, shall take his place and superintend the construction.

Mr. QUIGG. That is correct. And the sum of money which is proposed to be paid is the exact amount which has been paid to General Casey for the same work.

Mr. MILES. This amount, as I understand it, General Casey would have received had he lived?

Mr. QUIGG. Precisely.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. In the event that this appointment is not made, would not General Craighill necessarily and naturally take charge?

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, no——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then let me ask if General Casey has yet been buried?

Mr. QUIGG. I do not know. But the great Government of the United States must go on.

Mr. MILES. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Green is already drawing a salary under the Government of the United States, and there ought to be a provision, if it is not already inserted in the bill, that this shall be in lieu of the compensation now received by him. I ask to have it again read in order to see whether that point is guarded or not.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be reported, if there be no objection.

The joint resolution was again reported.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am not sure that the point is guarded as it ought to be.

Mr. QUIGG. I am quite sure that it is, if the gentleman will permit me. The salary that this gentleman receives is one that he receives under the rule of the Treasury Department; that is, that he is appointed by the action of his superior and that appointment ends, and his salary ends with the new appointment.

Mr. McMILLIN. With the statement made and that this is in lieu of the salary now received, I will content myself with the explanation given to accompany the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered and ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

On motion of Mr. QUIGG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; that the bill be printed, the Senate amendments numbered, and the bill referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the House take up the legislative bill with the Senate amendments, and that the amendments be printed and numbered, and the bill referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 111, to authorize Benjamin Harrison to accept certain medals presented to him while President of the United States.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Benjamin Harrison be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept certain medals presented to him by the Governments of Brazil and Spain during the term of his service as President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEELE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

CUBA.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, before the House proceeds to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, I desire to give notice that as soon as that bill is disposed of I will present a conference report on the Cuban resolutions.

Mr. BRUMM. Why not present it now?

Mr. HITT. I had proposed to bring it up, but the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague, desired to consider the sundry civil appropriation bill, owing to its great importance; and my colleagues on the Foreign Affairs Committee assenting to it, I agreed with him that the conference report should not be brought up for debate until the disposition of the appropriation bill.

Mr. PICKLER. How long will that probably take?

Mr. HITT. I am assured that the sundry civil bill will be disposed of very shortly.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

And then, on motion of Mr. CANNON, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I will take the floor and briefly explain some of the provisions of this bill.

I will say now that I probably shall want to take fifteen or twenty minutes to make a statement about the bill, and if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is prepared now to state how much time the minority desire for general debate we might make an agreement upon that subject.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have not consulted with the minority as to whether or not any member of the minority desires to discuss this bill, but inasmuch as no one has approached me on the subject, I take it for granted there will be no disposition to delay the House in considering the bill item by item. I shall only want ten or fifteen minutes to reply to the gentleman from Illinois, and my opinion is that that will be the only time that the minority will desire for general debate.

Mr. CANNON. Would the gentleman care about agreeing now that we close general debate on or before the expiration of one hour, on my assurance that he may have at least thirty minutes of that time if he desires it?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly; I do not object to that.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; I ask, then, unanimous consent that general debate be closed upon this bill on or before the expiration of sixty minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Right in that connection I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. There is a paragraph in this bill with reference to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. When we reach that paragraph in the bill I desire to ask the gentleman to pass it by, going on with his bill, that we may recur to this paragraph at the close of the bill. When that occurs, should the gentleman concede my request, I desire more than five minutes' time, for the reason that it covers a proposition which I have been looking into with some care and about which I think the House should be informed.

Mr. CANNON. I am perfectly willing when we reach it to adjust the time satisfactorily to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I presume that the chairman of the committee has blocked out his own plan for the use of the thirty minutes. Now, unless he has planned to explain an item here on page 45, I should like to make the same reservation with regard to that item.

Mr. CANNON. What is the item?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. The Alaska seal fisheries. I should like to make the same reservation in regard to that as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] made with regard to the other item. I should like to ask a question or two. Possibly it may not take very long.

Mr. CANNON. It will be under the five-minute rule. My recollection is we give the current-law estimates for the fiscal year for the seal fisheries. That is what we recommend.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Unless the explanation should be satisfactory, I would like more than five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. There will be no trouble about that. I can yield to the gentleman such time as he may desire. Gentlemen understand that under the five-minute rule in a bill of this kind there is always a little give and take about the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that general debate upon the bill be limited to sixty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will give me its attention for a very few minutes I think I can give general information about this bill that it may desire to hear. I have no purpose to enter into any lengthly discussion or debate about it. I want what I do say to be practical, and as to the bill in hand. The name of this bill itself to some extent describes it. It is the sundry civil bill. In the main it covers items that the Army, the Post-Office, the naval, the deficiency, the fortifications, and the other twelve or thirteen general appropriation bills do not carry. It has been constructed as heretofore, substantially within the law. In fact, appropriations not authorized by law are subject to points of order; and your committee recognize that as the House in its wisdom has made this rule, that in a great bill of this kind, covering the sundry civil items in the public service, there is but one way to safely construct it, namely, to obey the rules of the House, and recommend for your consideration appropriations within the rules and within the law. I need not say that it is not satisfactory to me as an individual in some instances, and I dare say is not satisfactory as to some item or items to every member of the House; and yet in your wisdom you have made the rules, and we can not have safe appropriations and proper appropriations except as we adhere to the rule. Your committee this session, as in the main in former Congresses, in the preparation of the bill adhered to the rule.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Will the gentleman tell us if there are any items in this bill not provided for by existing law?

Mr. CANNON. I do not recollect any. If there be any, I am perfectly willing to call attention to them and let the point of order be made, and I invite the point of order.

Mr. TERRY. I ask the chairman of the committee for this information, as he is necessarily familiar with this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I do not now recollect any, but in so great a bill as this, composed of so many items, there may be something not authorized by law. I say again, I welcome the point of order on anything in this bill that has not law at the back of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to ask the gentleman if the sundry civil bill has not heretofore carried appropriations for the Garfield Hospital and similar institutions in this city, and to inquire whether they are omitted from this bill.

Mr. CANNON. The names of hospitals are omitted in the bill, but the committee recommends the money for the purpose; and I think the gentleman will find, when we reach the item, that it is a wise provision.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I had my attention attracted to the item, and knew the gentleman was familiar with it.

Mr. CANNON. Attention will be called to it. I do not know that I will call attention to it in my general remarks, because my time is limited; but when we reach the real debate, in the consideration of the bill by items, it will receive attention.

Now, then, the regular estimates submitted by the Executive, upon which this bill is based, will be found in the Book of Estimates for the fiscal year 1897, and those estimates aggregate $40,000,000 in round numbers, and on the basis of those estimates there is a recommendation in the accompanying bill of $29,500,000 in round numbers, being almost $11,000,000 less than the estimates, and in round numbers $17,000,000 less than the law for the current year. This would seem to be a great reduction, yet we care substantially for the public service as well as, and in many instances better than, the law for the current year. It is proper that I should very briefly state to the committee wherein the items of this bill carry almost $17,000,000 less than the sundry civil law for the current year. They are very few. On river and harbor contracts we give $8,408,000, in round numbers, less than the current law calls for. For refund of sugar bounty $5,238,000 was provided in the current law, and there is no provision made this year. In fact, the law has been repealed. For the Library building the current law carried $900,000. The urgent deficiency bill that we passed carries $480,000; and that completes the building. For public buildings we give $1,838,000 less than the current law, which is all that is required for river and harbor work under contract and for public buildings until the sundry civil bill—this same bill—will become a law on the 3d day of March next.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will state in this connection that he appropriates only until the 3d of March for public buildings and to execute river and harbor contracts.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; certainly. Now, these items amount to $16,386,000, and substantially explain how and why this bill that we now report to the House is less than the current law.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman state in that connection what the reason is for this extraordinary method of appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. In the first place, let me call attention to the fact that I apprehend the only difference substantially between the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and myself touching this bill lies in the recommendation of the committee in the bill which provides for all contract work touching rivers and harbors and public buildings for eight months of the fiscal year coming, instead of, as he claims, I presume—although he can make the claim himself—that it ought to provide for the whole twelve months.

Mr. SAYERS. I will be candid with the gentleman and with the committee, and will state that with the exception of those two classes of appropriations I have no fault to find with the remainder of the bill. I believe that with those exceptions it is a good bill. It is a clean bill. There are no jobs in it. But, Mr. Chairman, I shall contend when I get the floor that in this respect it is a departure from the custom that has obtained in the House, at least during the eight years that I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, to appropriate only for eight months instead of for twelve.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention briefly to the practice of the House touching continuous-contract work. In my judgment the bill, in its recommendations for appropriations of that character, is right. It cares for the public service and cares for it logically and fully, and not only is the bill right upon the merits, but I call the attention of my friend from Texas to the fact that it comes in the line of precedent. The bill appropriates all that the Departments estimate will be required up to March 3, 1897, to meet authorized contracts for constructing public buildings and for river and harbor work. On the 3d of March, 1897, the sundry civil bill to be passed at the next session of Congress will become a law and should, and undoubtedly will, make provision in proper and ample measure for paying for the work under the contracts.

Now, I call the attention of the House to the fact that the appropriations for rivers and harbors and public buildings, like appropriations for fortifications, are available for expenditure as soon as made, and continue available until exhausted. Let me explain. The money appropriated by this bill for all of the public service for which it provides, except the contract work that I have spoken of, becomes available on the 1st day of next July; but for river and harbor contract work and for public buildings the amounts hereby appropriated become available the moment the bill is signed, and remain available through all time until the money is expended. All other appropriations made in the bill do not become available until the beginning of the next fiscal year, and must be expended or contracted for within two years. So it will be seen that there is a well-marked distinction between appropriations for fortifications, for contract work for rivers and harbors, and for public buildings and all other appropriations, and I hope gentlemen comprehend the distinction clearly.

Now, the policy of authorizing contract in advance of appropriation for public buildings and for river and harbor improvements was inaugurated by the Fiftieth Congress on the sundry civil act for 1890. It applied at that time only to the Congressional Library building. That, I believe, was the last Congress of which Mr. Carlisle was Speaker, and the continuous-contract system was at that time made to apply to the Congressional Library building; that was the commencement of the system. The Fifty-first Congress, in the sundry civil act for 1891, extended the contract system to the Washington City post-office building. The Fifty-third Congress, in the sundry civil act for 1895, when my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] presided over the Committee on Appropriations, further extended the authorization of contracts to the public buildings at Buffalo, Kansas City, Omaha, and St. Paul, the limit of cost on none of which was less than $500,000, and in the sundry civil act for 1896, passed at the last session of Congress, the authority was again extended to a number of unfinished buildings, including one whose total cost was limited to $60,000.

Now, until this continuous-contract system was inaugurated members might well have been anxious about the amount of the appropriations carried in the bills, because it was necessary that the appropriation should be made and should become available before the contract could be made for any given work, and the contract could not exceed the appropriation; but under the continuous-contract system contracts to complete buildings can be made from the time the first spadeful of earth is disturbed to make the foundation until the building is completed to the dome, without reference to the amount that is appropriated; and the same applies to contracts for completing river and harbor work. The contract is made practically in these great works long before the appropriations are made, and the contractor agrees to do the work and take his pay as the appropriations are made. The Fifty-first Congress, in the fortifications act—and I ask the attention of my friend from Texas especially to this—the Fifty-first Congress, in the fortifications acts of 1890 and of February 24, 1891, authorized contracts to the amount of $4,250,000 to be made for steel breech-loading guns for fortifications. That contract is not yet complete. The Fifty-second Congress, in the fortifications acts of 1893 and 1894, also authorized contracts for armament for fortifications amounting to $1,676,000 in excess of the appropriations.

After the first regular session of the Fifty-third Congress, in preparing to meet the contract obligations under the fortifications act, the House Committee on Appropriations, so well presided over by my worthy and able friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], provided only sufficient sums to meet the contracts until March 3 of that fiscal year—March 3, 1895. Provision was not made for the whole fiscal year, but precisely such a provision was made as we propose to make here in regard to this contract work.

That action distinctly established the precedent of appropriating at a long session of Congress for contract work only sufficient money to meet maturing contracts until March 3 of the following fiscal year, on which date the appropriation bills passed at a short session must necessarily go into effect. And the gentleman from Texas and his committee did wisely when they so provided for the public service, because the contracts were made, the work was going on, and the appropriations when made were immediately available; they never lapsed. They rested upon an entirely different principle and an entirely different foundation from all the other appropriations. Let me say again, the appropriations for public buildings and rivers and harbors are exactly like those for fortifications. In other words, they are excepted from the operation of the covering-in act of 1874; they are without limitation as to the time of their availability, and without restriction as to the period within which they shall be expended. Under these conditions there is no necessity for measuring according to the requirements of a fiscal year the amounts to be appropriated for either of these three classes of continuous-contract work. On the other hand, it is both reasonable and businesslike to gauge the appropriations by the natural periods within which Congress is called upon to enact money bills.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If I understand the gentleman's explanation, this method of proceeding does not diminish the expenditures of the Government at all——

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But simply diminishes the amount that this Congress seems to be charged with as an expenditure.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, that is a matter of argument.

Mr. BINGHAM. The appropriation is made up to the expiration of the Congress.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In other words, this bridges over the matter until after the election.

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. The gentleman has listened to me in vain if I have failed to convince him of the propriety of this method of appropriation, its justice to the Government, its justice to the contractor. I repeat that in reference to this class of appropriations we are simply following the precedent made by the last Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. And unobjected to by the other side.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; unobjected to by the other side, the matter being frankly stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], who was in charge of the fortification bill, and whose words on that occasion I have now before me.

I say again—and I ask the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee—that to appropriate for this class of work by fiscal years (the fiscal year in no way applying to those expenditures) would result in a lapping of appropriations; that is to say, if this bill should make appropriations for these purposes until June 30, 1897, the next sundry civil bill, which must become a law on or before March 3, 1897, would carry provisions which, under the express provisions of the law, would be available on that day. So that you would have the last four months of the next fiscal year provided for by this sundry civil bill and also by the next sundry civil bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Not necessarily. It strikes me that the rule has been to appropriate from the 30th of June of one year to the 30th of June of another year.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Now, here we have an innovation. Allow me to say, with all deference to the gentleman, that all we have to do is to continue the course that has been pursued heretofore, to follow the old rule, and then the country will understand exactly what we are appropriating for each fiscal year. But now you make a showing of economy, while there is no reduction at all. It strikes me that each fiscal year ought to be charged with its own expenditures.

Mr. CANNON. I say again to the gentleman that, instead of looking at the logical way of making appropriations for this continuous work, he comes to the conclusion that there must be some political move. I say to him again that, as to fortifications, as to public buildings, as to river and harbor improvements carried by the sundry civil bill, the moment that bill is signed by the President the appropriations are immediately available; so that if we now provide for these objects of appropriation for the whole of the next fiscal year, then the next sundry civil bill, which must become a law by the 3d of March, 1897, will provide for four months of that same fiscal year. Thus you have four months plastered over by both bills. Such a method is not logical; it is misleading. Instead of making a new precedent we follow the precedent that was so well made in the last Congress touching fortifications.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the gentleman, in order to do so, departs from the precedents of one hundred years.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. On the contrary, I follow whatever was good that was inaugurated in the last Congress or the one before. I follow the logical method of recommending appropriations. I follow that method which will adequately care for the public service. I do not want to care for it twice, because it will do no good to have two bills whose appropriations touching these contract works are spread over the last four months of the next fiscal year.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee refers to what he calls the precedents of a hundred years. But there has been a wide departure touching the care of our public works, commencing with the Fiftieth Congress, followed by the Fifty-first, Fifty-second, Fifty-third, and to be followed in the Fifty-fourth, namely, that, instead of making the appropriations for rivers and harbors and for public buildings, and doing a little at a time on them for years, and thereby paying the highest possible price instead of accomplishing much by contract—that is, under the old system—under the new system contracts are authorized at the beginning, the work is fully let, and the appropriations are made from one period to another, after careful inquiry, to meet the contract. It is estimated in the various Departments that this not only conduces to speedy construction of desirable public works, but also results in the saving of from 25 to 30 per cent in the cost of construction. This policy was begun, as I have said, in the Fifty-first Congress——

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is not the contract system of which I complain, but this method of appropriation for existing works. The result of such a mode of making appropriations must be simply to mislead somebody as to the expenditures made by Congress.

The contract system I do not object to, for I will admit that in many instances it has resulted in great saving to the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. My friend did not think of that in the last Congress, when this same system was adopted.

Mr. CANNON. No; my friend from Tennessee discovers it now, apparently for the first time. Fortunately for the country, let me say to the gentleman that this precedent was followed in the last Congress.

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee will remember that when we were boys and used to play ball, we used to call out "Three times and out." Now, once more, this appropriation for continuing contracts is not an exceptional one. There is not a man who abounds in appropriations anywhere in his bailiwick but wishes they were under a continuous-contract system, and when the money is appropriated as it is earned. That is all that is proposed to be done in this case.

And now, while talking of the continuous-contract system, that was born in the Fifty-first Congress in connection with the Library of Congress building, I want to say that these appropriations are exactly what I have already expressed them to be, exceptional in their nature, and if I can get my way about it, if I am in the next Congress, I shall seek an amendment to the rule that will create another appropriation bill in addition to the thirteen, I believe, that we have now, that would be an appropriation bill, under the rule, to carry appropriations for continuous-contract work; and I repeat that is necessary, because they are exceptional in their nature. Why? asks somebody. Because it is a system that reaches out. Not only has it reached out heretofore, but it is reaching out at this session. Last Congress two battle ships were authorized by law. The contracts were made in January of this year, and the sundry civil bill will have to carry the appropriations in whole or part for armament for these ships until they are completed.

The naval bill for this year authorizes the construction of work which will amount to some $20,000,000: Four great battle ships, their armament, and 15 torpedo boats, the contracts to be made in ninety days. I have no doubt—what amount it may be I do not know—that when the river and harbor bill is reported, as was the case in the Fifty-first Congress, and the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses as well, it will authorize contracts for the improvement of rivers and harbors without carrying the appropriation, and as the years roll around, these contracts being made and the work being done, a careful estimate will come from time to time as to how much money is to be paid on all of these contracts, and the sundry civil bill will have to carry them. It is perfectly evident to me that this kind of contract work for the public service touching these great improvements is right and will not be departed from, but will grow instead of lessening, and if that is the case the appropriations for it are exceptions, as I have said. Unlike any other appropriations they are immediately available, and never lapse. It may well be then, that, being unlike any other appropriation, instead of carrying them in the sundry civil bill, another appropriation bill should be framed, to be an appropriation bill, as I have said, for contract work or continuing contracts. But we can meet that when the time comes.

Now, I have nothing to conceal about the recommendations this committee makes. The recommendations are made deliberately; we believe it to be right, that they are in the line of precedent, that they are what was done touching fortifications in the last Congress, and we believe that there will be no deficiency at the time that this proposes to provide for. When we meet next winter, when the sundry civil bill is enacted into a law a little less than twelve months from this time, it will take up and appropriate for the same objects, the money being immediately available. Why, that is not new to any of us. It is the law. My friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], on the sundry civil bill for the current year, wanted to be absolutely certain about it, and not only wanted to enact the law to care for the public service, but wanted to take a bond of fate against the First Comptroller of the Treasury, so that in addition to appropriating for public works, he wrote into the bill what was law, namely, that the funds should be immediately available. It is right and proper in this connection that I should call attention to some of the items that we have increased upon this bill, for the public service.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before my friend passes from this portion of the bill, I desire to say, as long as he has not called attention to a fact which his report shows, that while as a matter of fact this bill is $16,000,000 less, or thereabouts, than the sundry civil appropriation bill of the previous year, as has already been stated, the decrease consists principally of three items, $8,000,000 being in river and harbor contract work.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. And $2,000,000, or thereabouts, in public buildings, and $5,000,000 in the sugar-bounty appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. That is right.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yet, as a matter of fact, if you had appropriated on the items in dispute for the full fiscal year, instead of for eight months, it would have increased this appropriation only $3,831,000.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is all there is in dispute, this question of $3,831,000. So far as this bill is less than the other, it arises from the fact that there is less contract river and harbor work and, of course, no appropriation for the sugar bounty?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly. I am not criticising the bill for the current year, passed by the last Congress. So far as it provided for the public service it was well done. If it had sins at all, in my judgment they were sins of omission and not of commission. I will be exactly frank and say that if this bill, which your committee reports for your consideration, has sins at all they are sins of omission rather than of commission. Yet after diligent inquiry we have sought to make sufficient provision for the public service. Let me call your attention to a few items in detail that this bill carries that the law for the current year did not carry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that he has exceeded his time.

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask for an extension, to give the gentleman such time as he wants.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This is a pretty important matter, and I think if it is desired on either side of the House, there ought to be a little extension of time. I suppose there will be no objection, and I move that the gentleman proceed without limit.

Mr. CANNON. In a very few minutes I will close. I have no desire to needlessly occupy the time of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the gentleman's time be extended?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is my friend going to take up another part of the bill now?

Mr. CANNON. I am going now to show where there are certain items of increase.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see on pages 54 and 55 of the bill you have made a provision for surveys west of the ninety-fifth meridian for permanent monuments.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. But you make no provision for the territory east of that meridian?

Mr. CANNON. That is right.

Mr. HENDERSON. You make provision for the country west of the Missouri practically, but cut out Iowa and all the country east of that?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. There are many of us who believe—whether these monuments should be in as great number as those west of the ninety-fifth meridian or not—that there should at least be permanent monuments in the country east of it. I should be glad to hear an explanation of that. I understand that the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, in a report previously made to Congress, has recommended that monuments be placed all over the country, although not as many in some parts of the country as in others.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman that in my judgment this appropriation that he calls attention to is subject to the point of order. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] that I did not recollect that at the time he spoke. That is one appropriation which, in my judgment, is subject to a point of order.

Mr. TERRY. And there are appropriations for light-houses, too, which are subject to a point of order, are there not?

Mr. CANNON. No; I think not. The full committee, or a majority of it, however, thought it was proper to report that appropriation for the marking of the topographical surveys, so that the House might adopt it if it desired to. We restricted it to the territory west of the ninety-fifth meridian, for the reason that it was urged strongly that it was necessary in the arid regions and in the mountainous regions, to enable them readily to make the irrigation and other surveys. We so restricted it for the reason that we doubted the necessity for this expensive marking of topographical surveys in Massachusetts, New York, and the country east of the ninety-fifth meridian. I will say, however, that if the item stands it is subject to amendment, and I do not know but that it ought to cover the whole country. That certainly can be considered when we reach it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no disposition to antagonize the item, unless we are to be deprived of the right of amendment. I understand it will only cost $250 per 1,000 square miles to make suitable marking in the regions east of the ninety-fifth meridian. If we are going to have markings made, I submit that they ought to be made for the entire country.

Mr. CANNON. I hope my friend, if he does extend it over the East, will put a limitation on it that it shall not cost over $250 for a thousand square miles. I shall be gratified at that, because I think it would cost $2,500, and I am not sure that a much larger amount would cover the cost. We can discuss that when we reach it.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is the estimate of the Superintendent. I say that on the basis of a conversation that the gentleman from West Virginia had with him on the subject; but here is what I want to submit—I may not be here when this matter is reached, and some other gentleman may call attention to it. I submit to the committee, if we are going to have a permanent marking of these lines, that we should have it for the whole country, although the Superintendent claims that it is not as necessary in the East as in the West. So far he agrees with the judgment of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. As to that class of appropriations, they are not best, in my judgment, and for this reason. The rule of this House is wise, in providing that appropriation bills shall not carry legislation. Why? Because, like this very item, somebody wants to inaugurate a public work and gets his appropriation in. The gentleman gets it inaugurated. Yet, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, when it is inaugurated it goes in and grows to be elephantine. Therefore the legislation that enters upon marking 3,000 miles across this continent of the topographical surveys should be reported from the Committee on Public Lands, have its day in the House, and have full consideration and limitation. Now, that is my general objection to that class of amendments. The whole thing can come up, when we reach it, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois, in the line of the inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], how disputes would be determined? Will the Government go into the question of determining the lines?

Mr. CANNON. All these things would come up for consideration if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] reported a bill from the Committee on Public Lands, and we could have it properly matured and guarded.

Now, then, I was going to call attention to certain items wherein we find the public service required something more than it was getting for the current year. Take artificial limbs for soldiers. The increase is $445,000; and the reason for that increase is that every third year they are entitled to a new limb; and the coming year is the third year. Now, public buildings are increasing, and for assistant custodians and janitors, for taking care of public buildings, we make an increase of $35,000, which on inquiry I believe will probably better care for buildings in that respect than they are being cared for now. For the enforcement of the Chinese exclusion act we recommend an increase of $25,000. I am not criticising the amount appropriated this year. I am quite sure that the gentleman in charge of the bill last session recommended what he thought was necessary and sufficient, and perhaps it is; but under the new treaty and under the disposition of Chinese to come in along our northern and southern borders, we can properly limit their coming under the law; and it was the opinion of your committee, I believe unanimously, that this increase of $25,000 should be made to better enforce the law.

Mr. SAYERS. Not unanimously; but the minority were willing that the current appropriation should be carried in the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Well, whether it was unanimous or not, it seemed at least to the majority to be wise. For back pay and bounty allowance the increase is $31,000, because of the increased estimates, and there will probably be that much prepared for payment during the coming year. For fuel, lights, and water for public buildings the increase is $25,000. For the support of Soldiers' Homes in States and Territories the increase is $100,000, to meet the phenomenal increase in the inmates of the Homes under the stress of hard times, I suppose, in part, and increasing age of the inmates this increased appropriation is required.

Mr. SAYERS. In this connection I hope the gentleman from Illinois will state that at the last session the bill passed carried all that was asked for for this purpose by the Department.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; I am not criticising. I am only showing the growth of the service. I have no criticism to make in this respect of the law for the current year. For Life-Saving Service gentlemen know the increase, which is $49,690, due to the growth of that service. In the Light-House Establishment the increase is $112,000 over the current law, which is necessary to keep pace with the growth of that service, and, if possible, for greater efficiency. For the enlargement of military posts we recommend an increase of $75,000 for the repairs, care, and enlargement of posts. We recommend an increase of $55,000 for the revenue service. So I might go on and speak of similar increases.

Now, I want to say that this bill—and I ask the attention of the committee—was constructed along the line of the following principle: to care for the public service as liberally as the service is being cared for now, with only such additions as are absolutely necessary to render the service efficient where it is not now efficient, from growth of service or otherwise. Let me say again, that in the existing condition of the Treasury the bill provides for appropriations for new objects only where their importance is so great as in the opinion of the committee to absolutely demand the appropriation, and are of such importance that a wise economy demands they should be made, notwithstanding the money to meet them must be borrowed upon interest. Along the line of that general policy this bill is framed, and I think it comes fairly within the policy that I have just stated.

Now, a word in conclusion. I want to speak for a minute about the policy of appropriation and the amount that we shall probably appropriate this year, so far as we can estimate and forecast it from the bills that have passed the House and those that are yet to be enacted, and I want to compare the appropriations that we are liable and likely to make with the appropriations made in the last three Congresses. In the Fifty-first Congress, as shown by the official statement, we appropriated $988,000,000. That includes the permanent indefinite appropriations. That Congress was called "the billion-dollar Congress." It broke the record, and yet, in the main, the appropriations were wisely made, because, as somebody said at the time, this country in its great growth had gotten to be a billion-dollar country. The Fifty-second Congress, with a Democratic House, when the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Holman, presided over the Committee on Appropriations, made appropriations aggregating, as shown by the official statement, $1,027,000,000, an increase over the appropriations made by the Fifty-first Congress. In the Fifty-third Congress, when my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] presided over the committee, the aggregate of the appropriations, as shown by the official statement, was $989,000,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman whether there was any impropriety in any of those appropriations? Is it not all a matter of politics?

Mr. CANNON. I was not speaking of them to show impropriety or for politics. I was trying to logically discuss for a moment, for the information and consideration of the House, what the amount of the appropriations to be made by this Congress might reasonably be expected to be, and right in the middle of my sentence the gentleman from Georgia breaks in with his remark, "The gentleman is talking about politics." [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I desire to repeat the question.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer the question, and if the gentleman will only wait a minute—if he will not anticipate that nobody can open his mouth in this House except for some partisan advantage, and will let me complete my statement of the matter—I think that even the gentleman from Georgia will realize the fact that I am trying to logically discuss this matter of appropriations.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not intend to throw you off your balance at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I thank the gentleman! If the gentleman had thrown me off my balance, perhaps I should have been for a second where the gentleman appears to be all the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEREDITH. We honestly tried in the Fifty-second Congress to carry out the works that had been commenced in the Fifty-first. Everybody concedes that.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not speak of these appropriations made by the last three Congresses for the purpose of criticising them. In the main they were necessary for the public service. I call attention to these appropriations in order that I may discuss for a minute what will probably be the appropriations required of this session of Congress for the public service. In my judgment, after careful examination of the matter, saying nothing about authorizations in the naval bill or on the river and harbor bill, the appropriations for this session of Congress, including the permanent appropriations, can not fall below $506,000,000.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand my friend from Illinois, then, to be preparing the way for an appropriation of over $500,000,000 by Congress at this session.

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment, taking into consideration the estimates that have come down and what are to follow for the public service, the aggregate of our appropriations will not be less than $506,000,000, including the permanent indefinite appropriations and deficiencies.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I make a suggestion to my colleague on the committee?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If that amount is reached by the appropriation acts passed by this Congress at this session, then suppose that all the appropriations were made for the full fiscal year, instead of until March next, what would the aggregate be?

Mr. CANNON. If we made full appropriations for twelve months instead of for eight months for contract public buildings and contract river and harbor work, the increased amount in round numbers would be a little more or a little less than $3,000,000, but if we pursued the course that you pursued and avowed and defended (I have your language before me) on the fortifications act, only twelve months ago, we would not appropriate that $3,000,000. Does the gentleman want his recollection revived as to what he did say on that occasion?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Just as you please about that.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have it here and will read it if the gentleman wants to hear it. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have said anything hasty, or seemingly so, to the gentleman from Georgia, if I have manifested that spirit in language or in manner, I withdraw both, because I have no unpleasant feeling toward the gentleman. Of course I can not withdraw the statement of fact that I have made. [Laughter.] Perhaps we are both a little hot-headed at times and not considerate enough. There is nothing in a business bill like this to beget any feeling. I have none. That is all I want to say.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I bear no malice, I am sure, against the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. This increase comes from a growth of the public service. It is necessary to meet contracts which were authorized in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses in part. It comes under the estimates submitted by a Democratic Administration, and we cut away below the estimates when we keep within the $506,000,000.

Some gentlemen may ask, Why call attention to this matter? I do so for this reason, and this reason only: You can not care for the public service of this country fairly well (without embarking upon new lines of service) for less than $500,000,000 and a little more.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I may just as well suggest to the gentleman, in all candor and truthfulness, that you can not do it without an increased appropriation every year that this House meets from now for a hundred years to come.

Mr. CANNON. I think very likely that is true. The country grows. But in presenting this great appropriation bill I call attention to the conditions, because many individuals believe that this bill has sins of omission instead of commission; and I have called attention to the manner in which it was constructed so that gentlemen may see that we have been as careful as we could be to care for the public service, but have nowhere entered upon new service or continued old, except as it was absolutely necessary.

Now, there is one other matter to which I wish to call attention. In the Fifty-first Congress we gave the largest appropriations that ever had been given for the public service up to that time. That Congress was called "the billion-dollar Congress." And in the Fifty-second Congress that succeeded, when Mr. Holman presided over the Committee on Appropriations, we had a full Treasury. There was no dollar of the public money paid out to meet our appropriations that was not collected month by month to be paid out, leaving money there after we met all the expenditures. I am not going into the whys or wherefores; I am merely speaking of a fact. Since March 4, 1893, we have continued to make appropriations the same as the prior two Congresses, but we have borrowed $293,000,000, and there has been no month, if I recollect aright, during that whole period—certainly no quarter—in which the outgo was not greater than the income.

In this condition of affairs I appeal to each individual Representative that we be satisfied with caring for the public service—not meanly on the one hand or extravagantly on the other. Do the best we can, this borrowing has got to go on to meet our daily and monthly expenditures; and in this condition no new work should be entered upon, no new expenditures should be made, after we have provided for the absolutely necessary expenditures of the Government, unless there be some expenditure of such overmastering importance as to make us feel that when we come to render an account to our constituents we can say: "We made that expenditure, notwithstanding the money to pay for it had to be borrowed at interest."

I thank the Committee of the Whole for its attention, and beg pardon for having consumed far more time than I supposed I would or could.

Mr. PICKLER. I wish to call attention to one of the matters of "omission" in connection with this bill. On page 51 I find an appropriation of $250,000 for surveys and resurveys of the public lands. I see that the appropriation for this purpose for the present fiscal year was $375,000 and that the estimate for the coming fiscal year was $442,000.

Mr. CANNON. Unless I am mistaken in my recollection, the appropriation for that purpose in this bill is the same as for the current fiscal year.

Mr. PICKLER. I have read the figures from the gentleman's report.

Mr. CANNON. Then I think there must be a mistake in the report. The appropriation for the current year is, I believe, the same as the amount recommended in this bill. As I understand, the appropriation for the current year is $250,000, and we recommend in this bill $250,000 for the same purpose.

Mr. PICKLER. Two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars in all you recommend.

Mr. CANNON. I believe the gentleman is right. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is the amount for surveys and resurveys of the public lands, and then there is an appropriation of $25,000 for survey of private land claims, etc. But if any discussion on that item be desired it can be had under the five-minute rule.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that such time be allowed the other side under the control of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Texas consume as much time as he may choose in the discussion of this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to consume as much of the time of the committee (if the members will give me their attention) as has been occupied by the gentleman from Illinois.

It is due to the committee that I should state at the outset that the only objection I have to this bill goes to the fact that a majority of the committee have failed and refused to appropriate a sufficient amount for public buildings under contract, and for river and harbor improvements under contract, until the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897. As to the other items in the bill, I believe they are in the main correct.

There are no jobs in the bill; there are no items in it which have been put upon it for special purposes and not for the public good, and I have no hesitancy in saying that I shall oppose all efforts to increase the size of the bill, although the appropriations for rivers and harbors and for public buildings are confessedly insufficient for the coming fiscal year. I will also say in reference to the bill that I believe, so far as public buildings and river and harbor contracts are concerned, that there is a sufficiency appropriated for those contracts and for the buildings named until the 1st of March next, and that the sundry civil bill to be passed at the next session, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, will take up these works at that time and carry them on to the extent of the appropriations then to be made.

But, Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is entitled "A bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes." The gentleman from Illinois will admit that for these particular classes of appropriations there will be a deficiency for the last four months of the next fiscal year.

Now, let us see how the gentleman from Illinois has proceeded with reference to appropriations. At the beginning of this session he had an eye to the size of this bill. I have served with the gentleman in committee, and have sat around the same table with him for eight years or more, and the gentleman could not help it if he would, and I will go further and in all kindness say I do not believe that he would, if he could, prevent a little bit of politics from entering into the bill.

Mr. Chairman, we had an urgent deficiency bill to pass the House a few week ago. There are two items in it to which I wish to invite attention. I will not delay the committee by reference to others that are equally liable to criticism. One is the appropriation for the building for the Library of Congress. It amounts to $480,000. Not one penny of that sum, as testified to by General Casey, who was before our committee, will be expended during the present fiscal year. It was in no sense of the word a deficiency. This accounts for the fact that there is no appropriation on this bill to complete the Congressional Library building, although the sundry civil bill, which I had the honor to report at the last session of the last Congress, was weighted down in the sum of $900,000 for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend permit me a moment? I know he does not want to misstate me.

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all.

Mr. CANNON. Just at this point, I recollect very well the appropriations that went on the urgent deficiency bill: $480,000, I believe, was the amount for the Library.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman from Texas will recollect that General Casey came before our committee——

Mr. SAYERS. He did.

Mr. CANNON. And that appropriation went in there because it was for a class of work that was not included in the original authorization of Congress, and he said that he could not make a contract for it under the general authority of law, and that it was necessary to have the appropriation before he could make the contract.

Mr. SAYERS. Ah, but did he not state at the time that he would not expend a dollar of it during the present fiscal year?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; but we made the appropriation so that he could make the contract.

Mr. SAYERS. But this bill is $480,000 less than it would be because of the fact that we put the appropriation on the urgent deficiency bill which this bill should have carried. It was in the power of the gent eman from Illinois, if he had desired to do so, to insert a clause in that bill authorizing the officer in charge of the building to make the contract. He did not do it, for the reason, I suspect, that the present sundry bill would be compelled to carry the appropriation. If this had been done the present Congress would be charged with the appropriation, whereas being on the urgent deficiency bill it could be and will be charged as a deficiency to the last Congress. But there is another item in the urgent deficiency bill. The publication of the Agricultural Report was improperly put on that bill also, and amounted to $300,000.

If we examine the sundry civil appropriation act f or this year, that is the act that was passed at the last session of the last Congress, we will find an appropriation of $300,000 for the printing of an agricultural report; but the gentleman from Illinois, in order to oblige the members with a second report to come before the usual time, inserts $300,000 in the urgent deficiency bill for that purpose. It, too, will be charged to the last Congress. I could refer to other items, all aggregating nearly a million of dollars, none of which were deficiencies, though they were put on the urgent deficiency bill. They were not deficiencies in any sense of the word, but they were put on that bill so as to relieve the present Congress of them.

But, Mr. Chairman, reference has been made to the Fifty-first Congress. The records of that Congress show that the appropriations made at its second session and after the election exceeded those made at its first session and before the election by $55,611,747.60.

In the Fifty-third Congress—that is, the last—the case was altogether different. The appropriations made at the last session of that Congress—that is, after the last election—were $8,221,440.69 less than those made at the preceding session and before the election.

The purpose of the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress was to equalize, as near as could be done, the appropriations of the two sessions, and if possible to pave the way for still greater reductions during the present Congress.

But, sir, let us consider briefly the particular appropriations of which I complain. The gentleman says that the Fifty-second Congress inaugurated this method of making appropriations. Is this true? The estimates for river and harbor contracts for the first session of the Fifty-third or the last Congress—that is, to cover the entire fiscal year ending June 30, 1895—were $8,300,000. How much was appropriated upon those estimates? The sum of $8,400,000, as shown by the records. That was at the first regular session of that Congress. What was the sum total of the estimates for river and harbor work to the second regular or last session of the Fifty-third Congress? It aggregated $11,387,115 as necessary to carry such work through the present fiscal year; that is, until June 30, 1896. How much was appropriated upon those estimates? The sum of $11,547,115. So that the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois, that the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress at either session had failed to give to the Government all the money that was necessary in order to carry out these contracts during the entire last fiscal year and the entire present fiscal year, falls to the ground. The record wholly disproves it.

I see my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who is second on the Committee on Appropriations—my genial and chivalric friend. I remember that at the last session of the Fifty-third Congress there was a cool round million dollars estimated for Philadelphia. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] and I had a talk about that item. Said I: "Do you insist upon all of this item, General?" "Oh, yes; I must have it." And he looked as fiercely and determinedly as when he rode along the field of Gettysburg amid the carnage of battle, and he got the appropriation. But, lo, when the estimate came up this year for Philadelphia—$850,000—my good friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] called the gentleman from Pennsylvania to him, and putting his arm lovingly around his neck said: "Harry, my old boy, can you not get along with an appropriation up to the 1st of March next?" And Harry yielded, and instead of demanding $850,000 he was satisfied with $480,000. A Democrat is not now at the head of the Committee on Appropriations, but a Republican, who is making a record for the coming campaign.

Mr. LOUD. He took it because he had to.

Mr. SAYERS. Has my friend had a sad experience before that committee this session?

Mr. LOUD. Yes; and shed tears, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. Let us consider these particular items somewhat further and see what will be the result. When we meet here on the first Monday in December next this proposition will be presented to the gentleman from Illinois and he can not escape it: Will he appropriate only for one year; that is, until the 4th of March, 1898, for these river and harbor contracts and for these public buildings? If he does, he will make a deficiency for the next Congress to carry. Or will he appropriate for sixteen months instead of twelve months? If he does not appropriate for sixteen months instead of for eight months, as now, he is as certain to have a deficiency which the next Congress will have to meet as this building stands and the people are represented by a Congress. The gentleman will not deny it. He can not avoid it.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend if he desires——

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). That in my judgment the recommendations in this bill will carry all continuous-contract work up to the 1st of March, 1897.

Mr. SAYERS. I think so.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says he thinks so.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Perchance there may be some mistake about it. If there is any, when Congress meets in December we will do then just exactly what we did on the urgent deficiency bill, when we put in an item of $300,000 for payment of continuous work that was absolutely needed at Galveston.

Mr. SAYERS. The necessity for an appropriation for Galveston Harbor on the urgent deficiency bill of this session did not proceed from a failure to appropriate at the last session of the Fifty-third Congress up to the full estimate for the present fiscal year. Turning to the Book of Estimates for the present fiscal year we find the estimate for Galveston Harbor to be $1,000,000, every dollar of which was appropriated. The reason why a deficiency occurred in this appropriation was that the work has proceeded much faster at that point than was anticipated by the Chief of Engineers, and not because of the failure of Congress to appropriate up to the estimate.

But, Mr. Chairman, I ask my friend from Illinois to tell the House when the next sundry civil bill comes up for consideration whether he will recommend appropriations for twelve or for sixteen months.

Mr. CANNON. I will state to the gentleman that we will do precisely as you did with the fortification bill a year ago—we will recommend enough money to pay all bills until the next bill shall become law.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman speaks of the fortification bill. Every dollar asked for the river and harbor contracts for the present fiscal year was given by the last Congress, and will the gentleman say there is one dollar deficiency asked for the present fiscal year because of the failure of the fortification bill to carry enough?

Mr. CANNON. I am not speaking of deficiency. I am speaking of methods of appropriation; and I will say, as the gentleman appeals to me, in my judgment this bill for this purpose cares for the public service until the next bill becomes law; and in my judgment that is a proper policy to pursue.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman has not answered the question. He has not been as frank as he ought to have been. He ought to have told this committee whether it is his intention to recommend an appropriation for twelve months or for sixteen months in the next sundry civil bill. If he recommends an appropriation for twelve months, the next Congress as soon as it meets will have to appropriate in an urgent deficiency bill for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend, if he desires, just at this point, that if the House will follow the recommendation of the committee and make the provisions in the judgment of the committee, there will not be as large a deficiency appropriation as there will be for this session.

Mr. SAYERS. Does not the gentleman know that there will be fewer appropriations for deficiencies at this session than for any session of Congress for eight years past?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend in reply that up to this time there is $11,000,000 in sight.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course, when you put upon the urgent deficiency bills items which the sundry civil bill should carry you will swell deficiencies; but if you will confine deficiencies to such as are truly within the definition you will not have as large a deficiency bill by very many millions as was in the second session of the Fifty-first Congress and in the first session of the Fifty-second. The deficiencies at the second session of the Fifty-first amounted to $38,699,746.96, and at the first session of the Fifty-second Congress to $14,441,121.22.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, we have no desire to deceive each other.

Mr. SAYERS. We can not. [Laughter.] You can not deceive me and I can not deceive you as to what occurs around the committee table.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask my friend to indicate any item that has been put on any deficiency bill that ought not to go there.

Mr. SAYERS. I have just indicated——

Mr. CANNON. Which one?

Mr. SAYERS. Four hundred and eighty thousand dollars which went on the urgent deficiency bill for the completion of the Library building.

Mr. CANNON. My friend and I want to be entirely candid, and I will be candid. I ask him again if it is not true that that $480,000 had to be appropriated before contracts could be made for the work, that General Casey said that he had no authority to contract, and that if the building was to be completed by January 1 next that it was absolutely necessary that the appropriation should be made?

Mr. SAYERS. But it was not a deficiency. I am not objecting to the item as an improper appropriation. It was a proper appropriation. My contention is that you have shifted it from the sundry civil bill to a deficiency bill.

Mr. CANNON. The sundry civil bill could not be waited for, because the appropriation was necessary at once.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman knows very well that not one dollar of that money will be expended during the present fiscal year.

Mr. CANNON. I know it is all obligated now.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course.

Mr. CANNON. And the obligation could not have been made if the money had not been available.

Mr. SAYERS. It will not do to say that, because we have again and again, in every Congress, since the Fiftieth Congress, authorized contracts in advance of the appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. But my friend knows the character of appropriation. My friend will bear me out that this does not come under the contracting power in that bill.

Mr. SAYERS. It could have been authorized. But instead of doing that, and in order to save the appropriation on the sundry civil bill, the appropriation was made upon the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is not so candid as he ordinarily is.

Mr. SAYERS. I try to be. The difference between the gentleman and myself is that we are going to two different points. He is trying to accomplish one thing and I am trying to accomplish another; so we can not agree.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has invoked the fortification bill as a precedent to sustain him in his method of appropriating in the pending bill for the construction of public buildings and for carrying out the river and harbor contracts. Sir, the two bills are not parallel. They are not on all fours, one with the other. Every sundry civil bill is entitled "A bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, and for other purposes."

The bill upon its face is intended to cover such expenses for an entire fiscal year, and not for a part of the year.

A fortification bill, however, is entirely different. It is always entitled "An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes."

As will be seen, no time is specified and no date is fixed in the fortification bill. It may be for a greater or less period than a year. No deficiencies are incurred under it, and it is solely within the discretion of Congress as to whether appropriations for such purposes are large or small.

I repeat the statement that the two bills are neither parallel nor analogous, and neither can stand as a precedent for the other.

As to the appropriations by the last Congress, at either session, to continue the construction of public buildings that were then authorized, it has not been contended, nor will it be contended, that such appropriations were not entirely sufficient for the entire year for which they were made. Not so in the pending bill. They are only until the 1st of March next—that is, for eight months, and not for twelve months.

As to the public buildings, Mr. Chairman, we find that the pending bill only carries $1,240,364.29, while $2,575,364.29 is demanded by the Department as absolutely necessary; and as to river and harbor contracts it carries $2,878,597 as against an estimate of $4,044,597.

But, sir, it is said in the report accompanying the bill that it carries $17,151,789.81 less than the same bill for the current year. That is true, Mr. Chairman, but it is only so to some extent from the unusual and unprecedented manner in which the bill has been made up. Besides, sir, the law for the current year contains many items which are not to be found in the pending bill, and which more than account for the difference.

I invite attention to a statement which I have prepared and which I will read:

Amounts appropriated in last sundry civil act for—
River and harbor contracts	$11,287,115
Ohio River improvement	150,000
Sugar bounty, refund	5,238,289
Library building	990,000
Light-houses, construction	542,350
Sufferers Ford's Theater disaster	125,000
Revenue-cutter vessels	325,000
Public buildings, construction	3,393,450
Government Printing Office, addition	100,000
International Monetary Conference	100,000
Total	22,164,204
Amounts in this bill for above items:
River and harbor contracts	2,878,597
Light-houses, construction	291,700
Revenue-cutter vessels	125,000
Public buildings, construction	1,558,074
Total	4,853,371

Notwithstanding these heavy and unusual items which are to be found in the sundry civil bill for the last session of the Fifty-third Congress and which are intended for the present fiscal year, it will be found upon examination that the appropriations at that session were less than those at the former session of that Congress by $8,221,440.69.

It was not so in the Fifty-first Congress, nor will it be so in the present Congress.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to yield me five minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, of course I am under very great obligations to my distinguished colleague on the committee from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] for his more than kind and courteous reference to myself and to our relations in the past, if not at Gettysburg yet elsewhere, and in connection with those relations he spoke of my fierce martial expression. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, that did not intimidate the gentleman during the civil war——

Mr. SAYERS. I had a gun in my hands at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman had a gun in his hands, but he had a much stronger gun when we were laboring together in the last Congress on the Appropriations Committee, an intellectual gun, and while mine did not approach it in power it was yet sufficient to convince the gentleman that as a million dollars was necessary to the great harbor in his State, so my great harbor, passing through several States, deserved equal recognition. I am free to say to this committee that no "fierceness" on my part or on the part of anybody else in the deliberations of the committee in the Fifty-second Congress ever troubled the gentleman from Texas in reaching his intellectual and wise conclusions as to giving to the House and to the country a fair bill under which the Government might be carried on. The gentleman calls attention to the fact that the bill under consideration appropriates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, but the gentleman must understand that that wording of the bill applies to everything in the bill other than that which is carried under the contract system, other than that which is carried in contracts for public buildings, other than that which is covered by contracts on river and harbor work. Every other appropriation in the bill terminates with the fiscal year. The appropriations pertaining to those lines of the public service to which I have expressly referred run continuously; hence they are not made for the fiscal year.

The gentleman calls attention to the fact that our Svengali friend from Illinois influenced me to accept his conclusions upon the eight months' appropriation in the bill. I did accept them; but I did not accept them until I saw that full justice was being done to the great harbors and the other important contract work of the Government. I did not accept them until I saw that my own section of this great country had been properly cared for. I discovered that because of the generous action of the gentleman who was in control of this bill in the Fifty-second Congress there was standing to the credit of the contract service in the harbor of Philadelphia on the 1st day of March of the present year $375,000, and that this bill appropriated for the next eight months the full amount that the engineers said could be advantageously expended in that time. I found also that for the gentleman's own section of the country generous provision had been made in this bill. What I looked at was not the question whether there was precedent for this particular form of legislative appropriation. I simply looked at the question whether the contract work of the Government was going to be faithfully and fully performed during the first eight months of the coming fiscal year under the limitations of this bill, and I find that such is the case.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. BINGHAM. One other point. I do not think the criticisms in this debate should be directed to the mere form in which you propose to enact your legislation. Those criticisms, if just, should apply to the necessity of the work proposed to be done, whether it can be well done for the sums proposed, and whether the system under which it is being done is economical and wise.

The gentleman knows that one of the first bills coming before us in every Congress is the urgent deficiency bill. We have had that bill before us in this Congress. Then later there comes the general deficiency bill, averaging, as a rule, from eight to ten million dollars at every session of Congress. That is because the normal appropriations under the statutes are less than the requirements for the service. Every appropriation in this great bill can be exceeded by the Departments. They are not limited to such expenditures as will make the appropriation suffice for the whole fiscal year. They will come into this House at the next session and they will ask for appropriations to meet the deficiencies which have occurred, because the allowances in your appropriation bills have not been sufficiently ample. I make the point that the criticisms indulged in in this House should run to the question whether the appropriations proposed are ample for the good conduct of the Government; they should not be directed to the mere form in which the paragraphs are inserted in the bill.

I believe this bill to be a good one throughout—as good a bill as we can present to this Congress. The gentleman has stated that we shall exceed in the sum total appropriated at this session what we have appropriated in preceding sessions. This is a fair bill. The gentleman's statement is correct. Outside of the criticism as to the contract service and as to the adoption of the eight months' limitation instead of the old limitation of twelve months I do not think there can be any just criticism against this proposed legislation. I am in hearty accord with the proposition that the appropriations for the contract service should run for eight months.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] as much time as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order adopted general debate was limited to sixty minutes, which time expired some time ago; but unanimous consent was asked that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] have unlimited time.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended until those who are opposed to the method of appropriation embraced in the bill may have as much time as has been occupied by the gentlemen in favor of those provisions.

Mr. CANNON. That is all right. I suggest that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended, and that he yield to any other gentlemen who desire to speak.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is satisfactory.

Mr. SAYERS. That agreement, as I understand, has already been made.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Texas yield the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SAYERS. As much as he may desire.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy only a moment. The position of the minority of the Appropriations Committee has been so fully and clearly explained by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] that it is hardly necessary to make even a single observation. I desire, however, to extend my sympathy to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, in his efforts to secure a proper reduction of the appropriations. I believe he will bear testimony that I have earnestly sought, so far as I could, to limit the appropriations of the Government to the lowest point consistent with an honest, economical administration. I think the majority of the committee will bear witness in the same behalf.

I must say, however, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Illinois declines to make appropriations in the usual way for the fiscal year, I am compelled to refuse to follow his leadership. I am sure that this side of the House during the present session has dealt with the question of public expenditures with as much fairness, as much honesty, and as much economy as when we controlled the organization of the House. Upon examining the official record, Mr. Chairman, I find that the appropriations for the Fifty-first (Reed) Congress amounted to $1,035,680,109.94; that those of the Fifty-second Congress aggregated $1,027,104,547.92, while the appropriations of the last Congress amounted to but $989,239,205.69.

The appropriations for the first session of the Fifty-first Congress—and I desire to call the special attention of the committee to the aggregate, because I concur in the view expressed by the gentleman from Texas that the appropriations of the second session of this Congress will largely exceed the $506,000,000 estimated by the gentleman from Illinois as the aggregate for the present session—the appropriations for the first session of the Fifty-first Congress were $494,456,248.65, while for the second session of the same Congress they were $541,223,861.29, which caused the total of the appropriations for the Congress to exceed the billion-dollar limit. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the appropriations for the first session of the Fifty-first Congress were fairly economical, and substantially in accord with the demands of the public service. It was at the second session of that Congress, however, when the unbridled Republican majority made the enormous appropriations that fixed the aggregate at the stupendous total of $1,035,680,109 for the Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to acquit the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and also the Speaker of this House [Mr. REED], because they endeavored to restrain the action of the majority in respect to expenditures—I desire to acquit them of having favored these enormously extravagant appropriations. I believe that the gentleman from Illinois and the present Speaker have never been quite content with the record of that Congress in so far as it related to the appropriation of public money. I know that the gentleman from Illinois, in the closing days of that Congress, standing in yonder aisle, over and over again appealed to the Republican side to stay their riotous assaults upon the Treasury. It is known also that the Speaker was not in sympathy with the profligate appropriations then made, and therefore I assume that the gentleman from Illinois, then as now in charge of the Committee on Appropriations, seeks to improve the record of that Congress and escape, if possible, a billion-dollar total.

I have sustained him up to this moment in his efforts to reduce expenditures. As a humble Democrat, I propose to stand by him to the end of the session in all proper efforts in behalf of judicious economy. But, Mr. Chairman, if the reduction of appropriations is to be accomplished in this bill and others that are to follow by the absolute omission of appropriations essential for the public service, I must decline to indorse such false economy. I will support the chairman when he seeks to reduce appropriations to the necessities of an honest, frugal administration, not because I am in political sympathy with the other side of the Chamber, but, being a Democrat, I believe that taxation in whatever form it may be imposed is a burden upon the productive capacity of the people. Whether it be levied by a collector of internal revenue, or through postal receipts, or by customs dues, it is no less a tribute exacted from the taxpayers of the country. Having favored economy in the last Congress, I will not depart from that policy now. In the hour of victory we upheld this doctrine. In defeat let us cling more closely to it.

The great founder of the Democratic party, in his inaugural address of March 4, 1801, concisely enumerated the essential principles of government. He declared, among other things, in favor of "economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened." It follows, therefore, that the hand of the Federal taxgatherer should be laid upon the resources of the people only to the extent of securing the necessary revenue to support and maintain the Government. I believe in this doctrine. It is essential to the happiness and prosperity of the people. But I challenge the attention of the House and the country to the fact that the majority of the Committee on Appropriations, in defiance of precedents, have refused to appropriate for the public service for the ensuing fiscal year an amount estimated at about $3,000,000. The necessities of the service call for this expenditure, but it is postponed until after the ensuing election. It may be that the aggregate total of this session's appropriations will exceed $500,000,000; but I submit to the House whether it is sound policy, whether it is a wise administration of public affairs, to deliberately refuse to appropriate that which the obligations of the Government demand during the coming fiscal year. It may be good politics, but it is faulty from a business standpoint.

Pursue your policy, gentlemen; we are in a feeble minority, and powerless except to enter our protest; but until the close of this Congress we shall continue to call the attention of the country to inadequate appropriations which may be prompted by partisan considerations. The total appropriations for this Congress doubtless will aggregate more than a billion of dollars, but if they are just, economical appropriations, and required by law the people will not complain.

I had occasion to say at the close of the last Congress that in my judgment the appropriations for that Congress, amounting in round numbers to $989,000,000, could not have been reduced much below $980,000,000 without repealing legislation which made the appropriations necessary. I believe that if we are to accomplish the desirable result of bringing the total of appropriations of the Government much below the billion-dollar mark, we must modify or repeal some of the legislation now on the statute books. But, Mr. Chairman, so long as these laws remain, so long as certain contracts exist to maintain public works, then this Congress should, without evasion and without attempting to mislead the people, make ample provisions for the public service, regardless of supposed party necessities in the approaching campaign.

Mr. SAYERS. I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be no concealment, indirection, or deception in legislation. Whatever is done in life, it is well that it be done openly. Whatever is done here ought above all things to be done with perfect candor and perfect openness.

Upon a few points both sides of this House agree. First, it is agreed that the Government of the United States, in pursuance of law, has entered into contracts for the completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, public buildings, and other things commenced by the Government. It is also agreed that according to those contracts there will be required for the next fiscal year a certain amount of money.

It is agreed also that the amount necessary to comply with the contracts entered into by law is greater by $3,000,000 for the next fiscal year than is carried by this bill.

Therefore, I conclude that there can be no legitimate excuse for the shifting method by which we are proposing to appropriate for a part of a fiscal year instead of a whole fiscal year. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] admits that he is deliberately legislating $3,000,000 less than the contracts of the Government require. He admits that he is appropriating for a part of a fiscal year instead of a whole fiscal year. He admits that the deficiency thus created will reach or exceed $3,000,000. He also admits that this is a departure from the custom of the Government for one hundred years. Against that kind of legislation I desire very briefly to enter my protest.

The gentleman claims that he has warrant for this extraordinary proceeding on his part, and on the part of the great committee over which he presides with such distinguished ability, in the action of a preceding Congress.

If precedents are wise, they are to be followed. If otherwise, they are to be abandoned. I understand that the precedent which he claims justifies this action originated in connection with a fortification bill. It also transpired that the alleged deficiency thus created has never been appropriated for since, and no demand has ever been made for it, thus showing that the action of the committee was wise and that the case cited as a precedent is no precedent.

Mr. SAYERS. I will say to the gentleman that the fortifications bill is not for any current year. It is just merely an appropriation without reference to current years.

Mr. McMILLIN. Exactly so; and I will supplement the remark of my distinguished friend from Texas by saying that the amount appropriated proved itself amply sufficient for the purposes intended.

Mr. SAYERS. Entirely, and no deficiency followed.

Mr. McMILLIN. No deficiency was created thereby; but here the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] admits that he is evading the contract into which the Government has entered; that he is refusing to appropriate money that must be appropriated next year; that he is merely postponing, not defeating, this appropriation. Now, I know that this is a Presidential year, and I know that "stump doctrine" has much to do with Presidential years, and that this is mere "stump doctrine"; but I do insist that it ought not to be sufficiently potent to justify the violation, evasion, or postponement of solemn contracts entered into and work honestly done.

Sir, what has been the custom of the Government in the past? The appropriation bills have been such that at the end of each session of Congress we could foot up the appropriations made and know what the expenditures had been; but here my distinguished friend from Illinois has fallen upon a new method, by which no man in America, by footing up these appropriations, can tell what the expenditures of this Congress have been, for he postpones the appropriations till future years, and will confuse the people thereby.

Now, I do not propose to make any argument against the contract system. Wherever it proves itself more economical it is well to adopt it; but I do insist that when a contract has been entered into the people should know the amount that that contract is costing every year, and there ought not to be a postponement of appropriations or amount of expenditures until after the election. If it is done, let the people know beforehand how much has been postponed. Let them know beforehand for what purpose the postponement has been made. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist that this appropriation is not needed? Far from it. He admits that it is needed. Does he claim that it can be avoided? On the contrary, suits could be brought on the completion and payment forced; and yet he says, "We will not make the appropriation, because we are to come back here next winter"; and while he does not say so, we all know that, the election being over, the bridle can be taken off and the horse whipped down the same old track to the same destructive terminus.

Now, the action of the last Congress is not to be taken justly as a precedent for what is proposed here. What were the continuing appropriations asked for in the first regular session of the last Congress? I do not say the first session, because the first session was an extraordinary one. In the first regular session for this work the appropriations demanded amounted to $8,300,000. The sum of $8,400,000 was given.

At the second session the sum of $11,387,000 was demanded by the estimates, and $11,547,000 was given. Where work was shown to be necessarily more expensive than expected, the appropriation was made; but here we propose to avoid appropriating the money, to reduce the showing that is to be made, for campaign purposes; and I doubt not, as candid as my friend from Illinois is, that he, when he comes to make up the estimates of the appropriations made by this Congress, will be figuring it to the credit of the party that he represents and leaving out these items. My friend from Texas has commented on the fact that certain appropriations have already been shifted from this bill to a general deficiency bill. I insist that that was unjust. In addition to what he has stated, I will point out one or two. He has already shown to you wherein $400,000 that was not legitimately charged upon the deficiency bill, because no law authorized it, has already been appropriated for in a general deficiency bill for the completion of the Library building, although it can not be expended in this year. By that method it can be charged to the last Congress instead of this.

Again, there is an appropriation of $300,000 for the printing of the Agricultural Report. That legitimately goes upon the next appropriation bill and does not belong as a charge upon the last Congress, and yet that has been saddled upon the last Congress. That has been charged to the Democratic Administration instead of this House. What is the necessity for this legislation? Why not boldly come up and tell the people what the last Congress cost the country and what this House is costing it? But these are not all. There was in that urgent deficiency bill an appropriation of $16,000 for the purpose of purchasing a building in Japan, not authorized by law, not contemplated by law; and hence it can not be a deficiency. It was an original appropriation, and although it is made in this Congress, it is charged as a deficiency of the last Congress. By an increase for the navy-yard at Brooklyn, also not chargeable to the last Congress, $50,000 is heaped up against the appropriations of that Congress as a deficiency, when it is not a deficiency. Fifty thousand dollars more in the same way for the increase of the Navy. All of these items, amounting to $898,000, have been put upon a deficiency bill, when they should have been appropriated for on this bill or on the other regular appropriation bills of this Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was not content that this method of legislation should be entered upon without its being known how it came and to whose charge these expenditures properly belong. Let us go on as we have in the past. Let us make our appropriations for each fiscal year. Let us make them in such a clear and distinct way that when the year is ended every citizen of the United States will know what his Government has cost; and then we will have no trouble concerning these matters. Let us not try to deceive the people. We could not deceive them if we would, and we should not if we could.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] desires ten minutes; and if the gentleman from Illinois will agree that when we reach the paragraph on public buildings he may have an opportunity to offer an amendment and speak for ten minutes, I will agree that general debate be closed now.

Mr. CANNON. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall have the ten minutes. I do not want to agree to any amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. I only mean with reference to the time in which he may discuss the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the minority does not desire any further time.

Mr. CANNON. Let the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For post-office and court-house at Kansas City, Mo.: For continuation of building under present limit, $50,000.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, after line 19, insert the following:

"For custom-house and post-office at Newark, N. J.: For completion of building and for purchase or condemnation of additional land, under present limit, $150,000; and the money remaining unexpended under previous appropriations for the completion of said building shall be available either for that purpose or for the purchase or condemnation of additional land."

Mr. CANNON. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that on examination I find this is authorized by law, and within the limit, and if the estimate had come before the bill was prepared, as it has come since, it would have been in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I want to ask a question. Has the building been commenced?

Mr. PITNEY. This matter is in progress. The building is substantially totally completed. It is for the purpose of an extension and for additional land and to make the residue of the unexpended appropriation already authorized available for the purchase of additional land.

Mr. CANNON. And within the limit fixed by the law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the appraiser's warehouse at New York City, N. Y.: For continuation of building under present limit, $500,000.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completion of court-house and placing a clock on court-house in Newbern, N. C., $25,000.

Mr. CANNON. I shall have to make a point of order on that amendment. It is not authorized by law.

Mr. SHAW. As I understand the rule, an appropriation is proper to complete a work in course of erection. This court-house is only partially erected. There has been no provision made up to this time for the erection of a tower or for a clock. The people of Newbern have petitioned me time and again to see the Supervising Architect and arrange to have a clock erected on the building. I have written to the Architect, and he informs me that it will take about $25,000 to complete the building with the tower and clock.

Addressing myself, however, to the point of order, as I understand the rule it is that where a building is in course of erection an amendment to complete the work is in order. That is my understanding of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the law providing for the construction of that building? Has the limit been reached and is this amendment for an additional appropriation?

Mr. SHAW. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The appropriation provided for in this amendment is not within the law?

Mr. SHAW. No, sir. This is for an additional appropriation of $20,000.

The CHAIRMAN. In the original appropriation act was the building limited to a certain amount?

Mr. SHAW. I am not sure about that.

Mr. CANNON. I can answer that question from the Supervising Architect's report. The limit was fixed March 3, 1889, at $75,000. By the act of 1890, $25,000 was appropriated, and by the act of March 3, 1891, $50,000 was appropriated; so that the limit was fixed at $75,000, and the whole amount has been appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of line 22, page 2, the following: "To supplement the appropriation heretofore made for the improvement and extension of the United States court-house and post-office building at Little Rock, Ark., in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $43,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order on that amendment that it is not authorized by law, but I will reserve the point if the gentleman from Arkansas desires to be heard.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] be allowed fifteen minutes in which to present the merits of his amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I have no general assault to make upon this sundry civil bill. The committee having it in charge doubtless had some sufficient reason for reporting it in the shape in which it appears here, but I desire to call the attention of the committee to a work of public necessity, a work of urgent importance, which the Committee on Appropriations has failed to provide for, and in connection with this subject I wish to ask attention to a statement transmitted to the Speaker of this House by the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to the court-house and post-office building at Little Rock, Ark. I read:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1895.

SIR: Referring to the United States court-house and post-office at Little Rock, Ark., I have the honor to submit the following statement:

Under date of August 27, 1894, the undermentioned act of Congress was approved:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the following improvements to be made on the building and grounds of the United States court-house and post-office at Little Rock, Ark., and at a cost not to exceed the following, to wit:

"First. To construct an addition to said building for the purpose of creating more room therein, and enlarging the judge's chamber and the offices of the marshal and clerk of the circuit and district courts, at a cost not exceeding $54,000.

"Second. To put an elevator in said building at a cost not exceeding $4,000.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause proper plans and estimates to be made for each of the improvements above contemplated, so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the full completion of either of them beyond the amount above provided therefor, said amount to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Also, under date of March 2, 1895, an item was included in the sundry civil bill for carrying into effect the above act, in amount $58,000.

In pursuance of the above legislation the Supervising Architect of this Department has had a sketch prepared of the proposed extension, and, after careful consideration of the matter, it is found that the sum mentioned in the above bill is inadequate for the purpose required, and that in order to provide an extension to the present building that will give the necessary accommodation to the various Government officials, enlarge the judge's chamber, provide a new court room and a new jury room, and construct the addition so that it will comport architecturally with the present building, which is faced with stone and fireproofed, will require an additional amount of $43,000.

I have, therefore, the honor to recommend that the additional amount of $43,000 be appropriated for the proposed extension.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. Chairman, when I went before the Committee on Appropriations in relation to this matter I was told that a great number of persons were desirous of having provision made for public buildings in their localities, and I stated then to the committee that if there were any that occupied the same position as this work did, if there was a single one that stood on all fours with this, it was the duty of the committee to recommend the appropriation. Here you have a solemn estimate sent in by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House, showing the importance and the necessity of this appropriation. In addition to that, I desire to call the attention of this committee to a statement submitted by the circuit judge of the eighth circuit of the United States, Hon. Henry C. Caldwell. It was written to me when I applied for the first authorization for this work. I asked then for a larger amount, claiming that the sum authorized was not sufficient, and Judge Caldwell wrote me this letter. I ask attention to this letter, and then I desire to submit the question to the judgment and the fairness of this Committee of the Whole and of the gentleman from Illinois himself, who has reserved the point of order, whether he will not permit this necessary appropriation to be made. Judge Caldwell's letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, EIGHTH CIRCUIT,
Little Rock, March 28, 1892.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just seen a copy of your bill relating to the United States building in this city.

I have said and written so much about this building in the past that I have grown weary of the subject. My letters are on file in Washington protesting against laying the foundations of the building under the limitations and restrictions of the act making the first appropriation.

I said then—and time has verified the correctness of my judgment—that the building which it was proposed to erect would be found totally inadequate to accommodate the public officers and business expected to be provided for within its walls. I knew this was so so far as it related to the United States courts.

I pleaded for two court rooms, or a judge's chambers large enough for a chambers court room, but all in vain. There is but one court room, and the judge's chambers is barely large enough to contain my bookcases, a table, and two or three chairs.

The result is that when there are two judges here and it is desirable to hold two courts at the same time, as it frequently is, we are unable to do so, except when the county court-house is not in use and is loaned to us, or we can get in the State house.

The want of another court room is a source of expense to the Government and of delay and costs to parties and witnesses.

The circuit court of appeals ought to hold its winter sessions at this place, and doubtless would do so if we had a court room, but under existing conditions it is out of the question.

I know nothing about the wants of the other departments. I only know that the present building does not furnish adequate accommodations for the United States courts.

Yours, truly, HENRY C. CALDWELL,
Circuit Judge.

Hon. W. L. TERRY, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Now, Mr. Chairman, see the position that this Government is left in at Little Rock on account of the want of a sufficient appropriation for this building. Both the judges, the district judge and the circuit judge, are residents of that city, and it often becomes necessary to have both the circuit and the district courts in session at the same time. When that is necessary, you have all the parties that are called to Little Rock in attendance on the courts, jurors who sometimes have to spend weeks there and sometimes months, parties who have to stay there at their own expense, and witnesses in criminal cases and jurors summoned at the expense of the United States. All these are delayed and all this is constantly going on, and the only chance of relief from such situation, that this great Government has to rely upon, is the courtesy of Pulaski County for a room in which to hold one of the courts of these United States.

Now, that is unseemly; and I appeal to the fairness and justice of this House, to its sense of what is due to this great Government, to permit this necessary appropriation to be made. I trust that my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will not insist on the point of order. In fact, I doubt whether the amendment is subject to the point of order, because this work has been undertaken; one appropriation to do the work has been made; estimates and plans have been prepared; and now, finding the matter in this shape, the Secretary sends to the Speaker of the House this estimate with a recommendation that the appropriation be made. I think, sir, that every consideration of justice, patriotism, and public spirit should induce this Committee of the Whole to grant the appropriation asked for.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, without respect to the merits of this proposition, I insist on the point of order that it is not an expenditure authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the appropriation beyond the limit?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MERCER. I offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 22, page 2, add:

"For post-office at South Omaha, Nebr.: For construction of building under present limit, $75,000."

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, with reference to this amendment, I wish to say that the Fifty-third Congress passed a bill providing for the purchase of a site and the construction of a building at South Omaha, Nebr., not to exceed in cost the sum of $100,000, including site and building. Time has elapsed, and thus far not a step has been taken by the Treasury Department even to purchase a site. Mr. Chairman, it does not take a great financier to buy a post-office site and erect a building thereon in one of the cities of the United States; and there is no excuse for it not doing justice to one of the busiest and most prosperous cities in the country by simply executing the law.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is not only not subject to a point of order, but that it comes within the purview of the legislation of this Congress. If we pass the amendment and appropriate this money, we can perhaps force the Treasury Department to purchase a site and erect a building, as should have been done some time ago. I submit to the House that this amendment should be adopted, and I trust that members will see the propriety of such action. For over a year $25,000 has been available, fifteen thousand of which is to be applied in the purchase of a site. Months and months ago the Department asked for sites and several were offered, all within the amount prescribed by law. I can understand the delay in commencing a public building, but there is no reason whatever for postponing the purchase of a site. I appreciate the position occupied by the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and regret that his hands are tied at this time. I will continue to bombard the Treasury Department, in the hope that a site may soon be purchased, and then will ask that a building be erected as rapidly as practicable. A dozen cities are in the same position as South Omaha.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation that the gentleman from Nebraska asks to have made is wholly unnecessary. It is true that the proposed appropriation is within the limit heretofore fixed, but it is also true that as to this particular building the gentleman is better off than are those interested in most of the public buildings throughout the country. The Secretary of the Treasury now has full authority to contract for that building from cellar to dome.

We examined into this question very fully, There has already been appropriated $25,000—appropriated twelve months ago. Not one cent of that amount has been expended. No site has been bought. And the Supervising Architect says that he can not prior to next winter make even the plans for that building; that he has not yet acquired the site, and that he will not exceed the $25,000 already appropriated within the next twelve months.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the Supervising Architect give any reason why he has not made the plans in all this time?

Mr. CANNON. Well, it seems to be the policy of the Treasury Department, under existing conditions, to go slowly. The Agricultural Department would not buy seeds. The Treasury Department in many instances (whether for a good or a bad reason) is proceeding slowly. Now, we can not have administration by legislation. The fact is, as I have stated, that the sum of $25,000 was appropriated twelve months ago, and that there has never been a site bought at South Omaha; that the Supervising Architect, after careful examination, tells us not only that the site has not been bought, but that the plans and specifications will not be made within the next twelve months.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If we can not have administration by legislation, and I concede that statement, and if a Department refuses squarely to carry out the intention of our law, why can it not continue to do so right along forever? If Congress makes an appropriation for anything and the Department refuses to act, what remedy is there on the part of Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows the answer to that question. If any Administration pursues a policy which, upon the whole, does not meet with public approval, there is but one remedy—an appeal to the people.

Mr. MILLIKEN. We will take that appeal.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think the gentleman from Illinois is dealing fairly with the Supervising Architect in this matter. This Administration has pursued the same policy that the former Administration did in regard to the execution of the law as to the construction of public buildings. The trouble has been that up to this date we have allowed that office only $200,000 per annum with which to prepare plans and specifications, advertise for bids, and do all those things of a preliminary character which are necessary before the actual construction of the building is entered upon. At this session this House has voted (and I believe the Senate has done the same) to increase that item of appropriation by the addition of $50,000, so that the Supervising Architect's Office will have after the 30th of June next $250,000 instead of $200,000, as at present, with which to execute the laws with reference to the construction of public buildings.

Mr. CANNON. May I ask my colleague a question there?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I wish merely to make this suggestion, that I called this to the attention of the Supervising Architect while examining him touching these buildings, this being one of a class, and he said that notwithstanding the increase he could not make the plans until the next coming winter.

Mr. SAYERS. That is so.

Mr. CANNON. And so far as the expenditure is concerned I ask if this appropriation within the coming year is needed?

Mr. SAYERS. I think not. I will be candid with the gentleman.

What I desired, Mr. Chairman, was for the House to understand exactly the condition, and not be impressed with the idea that the delay was because of a policy of the Treasury Department not to proceed toward the construction of these buildings.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will permit me, I have in my district——

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I move to strike out the last word.

I wish to say that in 1891 a public building was provided for in the town of Akron, in my district, and a year ago I went to the office and made inquiry about it, and they told me that they were anxious to put it up, but they did not have the money to make the plans and specifications.

Mr. SAYERS. That refers to the appropriation of $200,000 heretofore, which has been insufficient.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes. Now, this increase of $50,000 will enable them to go on with the work and put up the building.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes. That is the reason that I supported a resolution which passed the House recently allowing an item of $25,000 for the preparation of the plans and specifications for the building at Chicago.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For post-office at Washington, D. C.: For continuation of building under present limit, $275,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois in charge of this bill a question. Is not that very much lower than the estimate made by the Department for the construction of this building as being absolutely necessary to complete it?

Mr. CANNON. That is sufficient, I would say to the gentleman from California. It is all that is required for the building up to the 1st of March next. That is only a year from this time, and the fund will be sufficient to carry on the work up to that time. There is a desire and recommendation on the part of the Supervising Architect, for various reasons which I will not go into now, to break the limit of the cost on that building, but that will require legislation. We recommend, within the limit, all the money that is necessary for use between now and March 1, 1897.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is that all that could be used profitably if appropriated?

Mr. CANNON. There is about $100,000 still within the limit that is not recommended in the appropriation, because it is not necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If an extra amount was given, would not the work be pushed ahead a little more rapidly?

Mr. CANNON. No. There is power to contract, the gentleman knows, and this building is being carried on under contract now.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I asked the question because the work seems to be slower now than tar in January. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. All the appropriation that is available for the purpose during the year has been made.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the gentleman thinks so, I will not offer the amendment I had intended to offer at this time.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the sixth line on page 3:

"For court-house and post-office building at Cumberland, Md.: For continuation of building under present limit, $50,000."

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I offer this amendment for the reason that during the last Congress there was passed an act authorizing the erection of a public building for a United States court-house and post-office building in the city of Cumberland, Md., and $75,000 was set apart for that purpose. In the appropriation act of that Congress an appropriation of $25,000 was set apart to begin work on this building. The site has not yet been purchased, it is true, but if we purchase the site with the money already appropriated we will not have money enough to carry out that part of the contract, and it seems to me that it is therefore necessary for Congress in some way to provide not only for the purchase of the ground, but for the beginning of the erection of the building, if not its completion.

It may seem a little previous to suggest it at this time, on the ground, it may be alleged, that it is not necessary just now. At the same time, when you take into consideration the conditions existing, it seems appropriate that the amendment should be adopted. I think it is necessary that the $50,000 should be appropriated now, for if the work is to go on at all we should take steps not only to purchase the ground, but to begin the erection of the building at once.

Our people are anxiously looking for it. It is a matter of public necessity. It is the first time in the history of the Government that an appropriation of that kind has been asked by our section of the State. The Department seems to be slow in moving, I suppose because we live up yonder in the mountains, and they think we are not entitled to much consideration. The people are desirous that there shall be a session of the United States court held at Cumberland, and although the authorization has been given, it has not yet been held, because of the fact that there was no court-house in which to hold the court.

Now, we need a court-house and we need a post-office building. The sum of $25,000 has already been set aside. The Department does not seem to be in a hurry, and one excuse is that there is not enough appropriated to begin the building. Therefore I appeal to Congress now that, in addition to the $25,000 appropriated by the last Congress, you add this $50,000, so that they may purchase ground and begin the erection of this building.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman's attention. The sum of $25,000 was appropriated a year ago. Not one cent of it has been expended.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Not one.

Mr. CANNON. Not even a site has been purchased. We made diligent inquiry touching this building, and at the end of that inquiry ascertained that there could be no site purchased or plans and specifications made so as to be ready to contract before next winter.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I wish to say that I have personal knowledge of the fact that the Treasury Department, more than four months ago, received bids; that they have not seen fit since that time to give satisfaction to anyone as to what they propose to do; and I think that if the Treasury Department do not move, it is the business of Congress at least to put them in such a shape, anyway, that they can not have any further excuse.

Mr. CANNON. My friend will bear me out that they have no excuse now, so far as the means are concerned to begin this work. I call my friend's attention to the fact that the law gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to contract for the completion of this building, the same as all other continuous contracts. He comes and says, through his proper official, that the plans will not be made in any event before almost twelve months from this time. There is already $25,000 available, and the want of appropriation is not what is causing the delay. So that, in harmony with this whole bill, the appropriation need not now be made, and will not hasten the thing one thousandth part of a second if it is made.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I wish to ask another question.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Suppose the Treasury Department after having invited these bids and having already allowed four months to pass in which they have not moved a hand or foot or said a word or given a sign by which the people may know what they intend to do—suppose they go on in this way for a year or two? Are we to wait forever before they act upon this matter?

Mr. CANNON. Now I will play Yankee with my friend.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Do not do that.

Mr. CANNON. I will answer his question by asking another. How would the making of this appropriation affect that?

Mr. WELLINGTON. It would affect it in this way: The Treasury Department seems to intimate that the $25,000 may not be enough to purchase this site.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; on the contrary——

Mr. WELLINGTON. I want to say, if the gentleman will permit me, that the Treasury Department does not know what this site will cost, and we know something about it.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary—because I am better advised, I think, than my friend—we went to the bottom of all these public building appropriations and authorizations, and we found that it was not for the want of appropriations, so far as that is concerned. I have been entirely frank with the gentleman. This appropriation of $50,000 which he moves will not hasten the contracting for or the completion of that building a moment.

Mr. WELLINGTON. But will it not do this: Will it not put us in a position to buy this site beyond a peradventure and then begin the erection of this building?

Mr. CANNON. Why, you are in a position now to do it.

Mr. WELLINGTON. We are not in a position to do anything, except to purchase that site, and possibly not that; and if the site is purchased and we have not a dollar more to go forward with, the building can not go forward.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary—I have failed to make myself understood—the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to contract for this whole building at once.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Yes; but there will not be a dollar of the $25,000 expended.

Mr. CANNON. He has the power to make the contract; and he finds out from the bids on the contract what the building will cost.

Mr. WELLINGTON. If the Secretary has the power to contract up to $75,000, why not appropriate to pay after he makes the contract?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, my friend, occupying the fortunate position that Cumberland does over ninety-nine one-hundredths of the balance of the public service, with full power to contract, she can afford to be content with that, it seems to me, because there is no way, in making these appropriations, to expedite the matter.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I can not see it in the same light.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, I am sorry. I am telling my friend the facts.

Mr. WELLINGTON. But there is a difference of opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SAYERS. I move to strike out the last word. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that it seems that the policy has been adopted to appropriate only for eight months. That being the policy, the gentleman from Illinois, in my judgment, is quite correct in his statement that an additional appropriation will not be necessary for this building up to the 1st of March. Now, if there has not been a purchase of a site for the building, if I mistake not, if you examine the law you will find that the purchase of the site can not be made until what is called "sketch plans" shall have been prepared, and it shall be the judgment of the Supervising Architect, approved by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, that he can afford to pay so much for the site and at the same time complete the building.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. As I understand, the Secretary of the Treasury has already sent out and requested bids for this site. Would not that indicate that that stage of the proceedings had already been reached?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. That has already been done. That stage has been passed. The bids were sent to the Secretary of the Treasury four months ago.

Mr. SAYERS. But the Secretary of the Treasury has not opened the bids for the site. And even after they shall have been opened, if the propositions exceed a certain amount—if they reach an amount which if paid will prevent the construction of the building within the limit prescribed in the bill—then the purchase of the site can not be made.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Then it will be necessary to have an additional appropriation?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. That is just what I am trying to reach by this amendment. I think it may be necessary, in order to purchase a site and make provision for putting up this building, to have an additional appropriation. Now, then, it is true that this can not be done by next March if the present policy of administration is followed, but we do not know but by to-morrow or next week the Secretary of the Treasury may see fit to open these bids and settle the matter, and then we should not be in shape to go on with this building. We have waited up yonder quite a long number of years. We have waited anxiously, and we have gotten to a point where an appropriation has been made for our benefit; and after the law has been passed setting aside a certain sum of money we appeal to Congress now to give us a chance and let us purchase this site. Let us make the plans and go to work and put up this court-house, which we have needed there for a number of years.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if my friend will allow me——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word. The trouble is that the gentleman is not bringing the medicine to cure the disease. It is not the fault of appropriation about that building, should the Secretary enter upon it. As a matter of fact, he has not only got the appropriation, but authority to contract. I can tell my friend where the trouble is.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I would like to know where it is.

Mr. CANNON. It is a question of money in the Treasury, and that goes to a general policy that I do not care to discuss now.

Mr. WELLINGTON. We are anxious to know why it is.

Mr. CANNON. It is not a question of appropriation; it is not a question of authority to contract; but it is a question of money in the Treasury of the United States that stands in the way.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Why, the claim is made that there is a surplus in the Treasury of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There is no necessity for an appropriation. If you get the contract, the work will go on under the contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and before the result of the vote was announced

Mr. WELLINGTON said: I make the point that there is not a quorum in the House.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the Chair to count. There is a hundred present.

The CHAIRMAN (after a count). One hundred and twenty-six members are present. On this question the ayes are 11, noes 49; the noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 3, after line 6, insert:
"The limit of cost of the public building at Kansas City, Mo., is hereby increased $116,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I concede the point of order to be well taken, but ask the gentleman to reserve it until he hears the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury read, and then, perhaps, he may relent.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend wants to be heard on his amendment I will with great pleasure, out of my love for him, reserve the point of order, but at the end I will make it all the same.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I see an unrelenting look in the eye of the gentleman in charge of this bill, so I will simply ask to have printed in the RECORD the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. In my judgment it conclusively establishes the necessity for this increase of limit.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The estimate is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 9, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following statement relative to the United States post-office and court-house building at Kansas City, Mo.

The limit of the cost of the site and building as fixed by act of Congress of January 2, 1891, is $1,200,000, of which amount the cost of the site was $451,578.33, leaving a balance applicable to the construction of the building of $748,421.67.

The cost of the contracts and contingent expenses to date is $508,285.46, leaving a balance for the completion of the building of $240,136.21.

The work yet uncontracted for consists of the dome, roofing, terra-cotta arches, plastering, joiner work, iron stairs, plumbing, heating, electric wiring, elevators, approaches, etc., and the Supervising Architect of this Department estimates that to complete these items the sum of $356,136.21 will be required.

Thus it appears that the additional sum of $116,000, over and above the present limit of the cost of said building as now fixed by Congress, is necessary for the completion of the building, and I therefore have the honor to recommend that the said additional amount be appropriated for that purpose.

The cause leading to the necessity for this additional appropriation is that Llano County (Tex.) granite was used in the construction instead of limestone or sandstone, the materials originally intended in the official estimate, which change incidentally largely increased contingent expenditures also.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs and preservation of public buildings: Repairs and preservation of custom-houses, court-houses, post-offices, marine hospitals, quarantine stations, and other public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $250,000, of which amount the sum of $30,000 to be used for the marine hospitals and quarantine stations: Provided, That of the sum hereby appropriated not exceeding $10,000 may be used, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the employment of superintendents and others at a rate of compensation not exceeding for any one person $6 per day.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Line 19, page 34, after the word "stations," insert "and the sum of $70,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, to be used in making repairs to the Federal building at St. Albans, Vt., recently partially destroyed by fire."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I shall be compelled to reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I insist that this amendment is not subject to the point of order. The Chair will notice that the appropriation under this paragraph is for the purpose of repairing and preserving "custom-houses, court-houses, post-offices, marine hospitals, quarantine stations, and other public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $250,000." Now, the amendment which I propose simply appropriates a portion of this gross sum of $250,000 for the repair of a Federal building coming within the class of buildings named in the paragraph, the public building at St. Albans, Vt., which was recently partially destroyed by fire.

Mr. Chairman, in reference to the merits of the proposition, I have to say that the Government, at a large expense—I forget the amount, but nearly $200,000—constructed a public building for the purposes of a court-house, custom-house, internal-revenue collector's office, and other Federal purposes at St. Albans, which was, to all intents and purposes, completed the day that the fire occurred in that town. The furniture for the building had been contracted for, the doors and windows put in, and within three weeks the building would have been open for the occupancy of the Government officials. A fire came upon that town which, in proportion to the size of the town, was as disastrous as the Chicago fire of 1871 was to the city of Chicago. The business portion of St. Albans was wiped out in two hours, and this public building was very badly damaged. It is built of Vermont marble. Some portions of the walls still remain intact and unharmed, but the Secretary of the Treasury sent an expert there, who has estimated that it will take $70,000 to restore the building to the condition it was in before the fire.

Mr. BINGHAM. What was the date of that fire?

Mr. POWERS. Some time last July.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was prior to the estimates being made.

Mr. POWERS. Very likely. One word more, Mr. Chairman. The Senate has already passed a special bill appropriating $70,000 for the purpose of making these repairs. That bill has come to the House and has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but there is not likely to be action upon it for some time. The circumstances are these: Here is a building with the roof burned off, the inside finish destroyed, some portions of the walls not injured, but a great portion of them so damaged that they must be rebuilt. The Government will not even incur the expense of putting a shed over the building, because the officials say they have no money available for that purpose. Now, I do not ask for a specific appropriation of $70,000, which would increase this bill by so much, but I do ask to have $70,000 of the sum already carried in the bill for the general purpose of repairs applied specially to the repairs of this building at St. Albans.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if the roof of your house should be burned off, would you not, as a prudent man, repair it at once, and thereby preserve the balance of the structure? Just so ought the Government to do in this case. Any man who looks at the circumstances for a single moment must see that good business husbandry demands that this building of the Government be taken in hand at once and speedily put into the condition that is needed for the public business. The Government is now paying heavy rent for the use of offices at that place, St. Albans being the third largest port of entry in this country. This appropriation is absolutely demanded in the interest of business at that point.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether this building which was burned down was insured?

Mr. POWERS. It was not. The Government never insures its public buildings; it declines to do so.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Why?

Mr. POWERS. That is a question which I would like to have the gentleman answer. I never could understand the reason.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I am not in the Government.

Mr. POWERS. I insist that the amendment is not subject to a point of order. It simply proposes to utilize a portion of the $225,000 that the bill itself carries.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Vermont has presented this matter (as he does every question that he treats) so clearly and so strongly that if a bill to exceed the limit in the construction of this public building were before the House for consideration I think I should vote with him. But as the proposition now comes up on this appropriation bill it is clearly subject to a point of order, because it proposes to legislate. The gentleman substantially gives his case away when he says the Senate has passed a separate bill which is now pending before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House. But I am not driven to that argument. I hold in my hand the report of the Supervising Architect, which states that the act of January 26, 1891, limits the cost of the site and building at St. Albans, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, to $60,000, every cent of which has been appropriated. There is the whole story. I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. POWERS. With all due respect to the Chairman, I ask to take an appeal.

The question being taken, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" it was decided in the affirmative.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARINE HOSPITALS.

For marine hospital at Boston, Mass.: For additional for elevator, $1,500; board fence, $350; in all, $1,850.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, early in this session I introduced a bill which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, a bill which, if it had been acted on, might have placed us in such a position that all the appropriations here asked for could have properly been granted.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, that bill provided that so long as the gold standard is maintained in this country the salary of all the officials, including Congressmen, be reduced to three-fourths the salaries now provided by law, and that the committees of this House having charge of appropriations be instructed to prepare said bills in conformity with the provisions of this act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we must either reduce salaries or we must enact the Senate substitute into law, and thus provide for the coinage of silver. The arguments in favor of the gold standard were little more than the reiteration of the same scarecrow doctrines that were sent here from Wall street to oppose the silver-coinage law of 1878 and which have been reiterated every time a silver-coinage bill has been brought before this body. The arguments were shown to be fallacious then and the history of the last eighteen years has proven them to be utterly without foundation.

A most distinguished member of this body—probably the ablest lawyer from the State which he represents on this floor, and by far the ablest advocate of the gold standard on this side of the House, a gentleman for whom we all entertain profound regard, a gentleman whom I saw in his seat a few moments ago—after the fallacy of those arguments had been exposed, after every principle and theory that he advocated on this question had been refuted, cried out: "Stop all this agitation for the free and unlimited coinage of silver."

Yes, the distinguished gentleman cried, "You must not agitate." That, Mr. Chairman, has been the exclamation of tyrants in all ages—"you must not agitate." [Applause.] When gentlemen resort to this ultimatum they admit that their arguments are fallacies. Nero told the people that they "must not agitate"; Caligula told the people that they "must not agitate." The gold-standard bankers of New York City, who now own substantially all the gold in the United States—so much was shown by the late bids on the bonds—were able to purchase bonds for gold to the amount of $102,448,199.55, while the 20,000,000 people who live south of the Ohio and Potomac rivers were only able to purchase to the amount of $222,086.

These gentlemen of New York insist that "this gold must be the only money of ultimate redemption." They have the farmers of the South and West by the throat, and they say, "You must not agitate. If you do, we will make it worse for you; we control the money of the land; we have a power which you can not resist"; and the distinguished gentlemen who advocate the gold-standard policy cry out, "You must not agitate." "You farmers of the West, you farmers of the South," cry the bankers and monied men, "we have by our methods reduced the value of your products to one-half; we have degraded you to mere toilers; we have elevated ourselves to be money kings and sovereigns; and now we say, 'You must not agitate' [applause]; if you agitate this question we will make matters worse for you."

A few days ago I was cut off in the midst of a sentence while showing the inconsistency of my friend, Mr. PATTERSON, in contending that an excess in silver production made bimetallism impossible.

When Mr. PATTERSON was as ardent a bimetallist as myself silver production was nearly double that of gold and there might then have been a shadow of ground for such a contention.

Now he admits that the production of gold far exceeds that of silver, and certainly if it was right and wise for him to contend for silver coinage then it is ten times as right and wise and there are ten times the reasons for him to contend for it now.

The distinguished gentleman, Mr. PATTERSON, also said:

> By the laws of the United States all the gold in the world can be lawfully brought to the mints of the United States and there coined into money, without charge for mintage, at the rate of 23.22 grains of pure gold to the dollar; it follows necessarily that the commercial value of 23.22 grains of gold is exactly equal to the purchasing power of the dollar into which it is coined.

Now, I ask my friend if he will not admit that silver would have the same dignity and the same power if its treatment were the same as that which he states is accorded to gold?

In all his long speech he did not utter a syllable to refute this. His entire speech was little more than personal assertions and fearful forebodings.

The speeches of these gentlemen are merely a repetition of the exploded theories which the Wall street and Lombard street bankers and brokers sent here in 1877 and 1878 to oppose the silver-coinage law of 1878, and which were reiterated by the same men when they struck the final blows upon silver by the bullion bill of 1890 and purchase-clause repeal of 1893.

Every prediction made by these men has proven to be false, and every prediction made by the friends of silver has proven to be correct and true. They said the silver-coinage act of 1878 would be followed by panic and distress. We denied this and insisted that it would bring prosperity. We were right and the gold-standard bankers were wrong.

And yet the burden of Mr. PATTERSON'S speech is a reiteration of this scarecrow fallacy which the Wall street men have sent here to induce representatives of the people to enact laws which will double the value and power of the money which they possess. In the summer of 1893 they and their friends in this House insisted that the purchase-clause repeal would promptly restore prosperity and a rise in prices; we denied it and said distress and falling prices would follow. The result proves that we were right and they were wrong.

I assert that every material prediction made by the gold-standard advocates has been proved to be fallacious and devoid of truth and that every material prediction made by the opponents of the gold-standard policy has proved to be sound and true.

I beg that Mr. PATTERSON will explain to this House why it is that his predictions that panic would follow a silver-coinage act now have any more basis than the same refuted predictions which were made just before the silver-coinage act of 1878. But they say if the Government should coin and pay out silver, gold would cease to circulate as money and would go to a premium.

I deny this, and in reply state that under the ruinous gold-standard policy gold has ceased to circulate as money and is being hoarded by the bankers and moneyed men to be used in coercing the issuance of more bonds.

So effectually has gold been hoarded that, as indicated by the late bids for bonds, for each $1 of gold per capita south of the Potomac and Ohio rivers there is $5,532 in New York City; and during the last two years the Government has paid, or obligated itself to pay, these bankers and brokers and the Rothschilds a premium on gold to the amount of $244,000,000.

This is for interest alone, saying nothing about the principal we have obligated ourselves to pay.

The gentlemen commit a great error when they say that the opponents of the gold standard insist and will accept nothing but free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1. This is not true.

The bill I offered and have urged before this House is free from every objection which has been urged against free coinage, and yet the gold-standard men oppose it and oppose even its consideration. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase all pure silver bullion and all pure gold bullion which may be tendered to the Government at a price not exceeding the average market price of said gold and silver bullion in the six leading markets of the world, said average price to be determined by the latest reports in the possession of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue in payment of such purchases of silver and gold bullion Treasury notes of the United States, to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury in such form and of such denominations as he may deem most suitable for the use of the people; and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and such notes, when held by any national banking association, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be coined all of said gold and silver purchased under the provisions of this act, or so much thereof as it is possible to coin by using the fullest capacity of the mints of the United States. But it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to, as nearly as practicable, coin the same amount of dollars in silver as is coined in gold, and a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated.

SEC. 4. That the Treasury notes issued in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be redeemable on demand, in coin, at the Treasury of the United States, or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States, and when so redeemed may be reissued.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury in redeeming the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of this act to redeem them partly in gold and partly in legal tender silver, in that proportion in which the two metals were in the Treasury at the opening of business on the day on which the Treasury notes are presented.

SEC. 6. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are repealed.

I also introduced a bill to repeal the unconstitutional tax of 10 per cent upon issues of banks other than national banks.

This would divorce our banking system from the Government Treasury and would restore prosperity to the rural sections, and would break the tyrannical power of the moneyed men of the Northeast, but this bill is opposed by the New York bankers and their friends and champions in this House. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all laws or parts of laws that place a tax upon the circulation of banks chartered by States, or in any way restrict banks chartered by States from issuing bills for circulation, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

In order to do partial justice to the producing classes, and so far as I could induce Congress to consider silver legislation, I introduced the following bill:

Whereas the establishment of the gold standard in this country has reduced prices of products to about half their value under the double standard; and

Whereas the farmers and producing classes, who from their incomes pay the salaries of all Government officials, have by reason of the gold standard suffered a loss of one-half of their incomes:

Therefore, in order to do a measure of justice to the 40,000,000 farmers and producers of our country,

Be it enacted, etc., That so long as the gold standard is maintained in this country the salaries of all officials, including Congressmen, be reduced to three-fourths the salaries as now provided by law.

SEC. 2. That the committees of this House having charge of appropriation bills be instructed to prepare said bills in conformity with the provision of the first section of this act.

I contend that if these bills should be enacted into law it would preserve the honor and dignity of the country and restore the people of the entire land to prosperity and happiness. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

For salaries of superintendents for the life-saving stations as follows:
For one superintendent for the coasts of Maine and New Hampshire, $1,600.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question with reference to this part of the bill.

I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill what salary is now allowed by law for the superintendent of the Life-Saving Service for the district of Maine and New Hampshire?

Mr. CANNON. The salary fixed by legislation is $1,800, I will say to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. Then I would like to ask what object the committee has in cutting down the salary of these men, as in this case, from $1,800 to $1,600—men who perform some of the most important and trying duties connected with any part of the United States service?

Mr. CANNON. I would state to the gentleman that the law for the current year, the appropriation bill providing for the Life-Saving Service, fixes the salary of the superintendent at this point at $1,600——

Mr. LOUD. I understand that.

Mr. CANNON. And I think it was cut down two years ago from $1,800 to that sum in an appropriation bill. I suppose the gentleman desired to ask the question as to the time it was done. Two years ago, I think, when the Democratic party had the House and Senate, they took into consideration the condition of the Treasury and the great decrease in the price of living, and came to the conclusion that $1,600 was enough for these life-saving superintendents, and made the appropriation accordingly. We followed that lead, believing that if for two years past it was enough and the compensation was then adequate, that it is still enough, for there has been no very material advance in the cost of living and no special increase in the duties. And the truth of the matter is that, while there has been a movement all along the line for more salaries in the public service, it occurred to the committee that we would not recommend them or recommend the appropriation for increased amounts at this time. We find it that way, and repeat the recommendation carried in the current appropriation bill. That is all.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Illinois will find me as conservative as the average member of this House. But I do not believe that there is a person within the limits of the House, who will for a moment investigate the facts and ascertain the duties performed by the superintendents of the life-saving stations, who will not come honestly to the conclusion with me that, instead of being paid $1,800 a year as their compensation, they should be paid at least $3,000 a year.

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, no!

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Texas dissents. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that these men have to give heavy bond? They give a bond of from thirty to fifty thousand dollars each; $30,000 being the minimum.

Take my own case as an illustration—my district. The superintendent of the life-saving service there has a length of 1,200 miles of coast line to supervise, while the number of stations which he is compelled to visit and inspect I am not able to state; but the number is very great.

I remember a number of years ago when I first met him. I supposed, in my simplicity, that the superintendent of the life-saving service, a man who had such important duties to perform, who was intrusted with such a responsible service, ought at least to get a respectable salary; but when I discovered that he got only $1,800 a year, as prescribed by law, it is not too much to say that I was perfectly paralyzed.

Because, Mr. Chairman, when you come to take into consideration the duties they perform, the immense responsibilities that devolve on them, and contemplate that they are not receiving the average salary that is paid to the ordinary clerk in the Departments at Washington, you must agree with me that the effort of law to fix the salary of these men at something commensurate with their services was a lamentable failure.

Of course there is a little history connected with the transaction which brought about the reduction from $1,800 to $1,600. The gentleman from Texas is probably as familiar with that as anybody in the House. Some superintendents were getting fourteen or fifteen hundred dollars a year, and gentlemen representing those districts desired to get them increased. The fact that the law only allows $1,400 or $1,500 was no barrier, for they undertook to make the increase in the appropriation bill. It went to the Senate, and this salary is the result of a compromise in conference. Because one or two gentlemen sought to have the salaries raised to a half-way respectable amount for the superintendents in their districts, as a consequence, by reason of a compromise, all of the salaries were cut down to $1,600.

Now, while I shall make no factious fight on this matter and offer no amendment at this point, I shall, when we come to my district, offer an amendment, and appeal to the sense of justice of the House to support it, to increase the salary, because, permit me to say, the day may come when your life may depend upon the efficient services rendered by these superintendents of the life-saving service. There is not a day passes but that hundreds of the lives of our people are dependent upon their efficiency.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment.

The explanation of the gentleman from Illinois, the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is ingenious but not satisfactory. The pay was not $1,800 in the district of Maine and New Hampshire, as the gentleman suggested, but $1,500, and last year it was raised to $1,600 in that and other districts. In order to do that those superintendents who were paid $1,800 were reduced to $1,600. So instead of being a reduction in the districts named, it was a positive increase of $100 in each. Let me state that I represent here one of the largest life-saving districts in the country, with over thirty life-saving stations, including the whole of Long Island and the State of Rhode Island, covering in all 41 life-saving stations, as I understand it. The superintendent was paid $1,800. He gives a $50,000 bond. It is the opinion of the Treasury Department that the salary is wholly inadequate. I have here the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I ask that the Clerk read the extract which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The uniform rate of $1,600 per annum, appropriated by the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the current fiscal year, as compensation for the superintendents of life-saving districts, is not deemed adequate to the service performed in any of the districts, except one. These officers are charged with duties of great importance and responsibility, and are required to furnish bonds ranging from $10,000 to $50,000. A salary of $1,800 per annum, which was paid to the superintendents of 8 of the 12 districts prior to the present fiscal year, would be no more than fair compensation to any of them, except in the seventh district, where all but two of the stations are houses of refuge, without crews, and the duties are consequently less important than in the other districts, and it is recommended that with this exception the salaries be fixed at that rate.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, the law is still in existence. We do not change the law by placing the salary back at $1,800. We simply make the appropriation that the law requires.

The Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, Mr. Kimball, favorably known to us all, speaks very earnestly on this whole question in his last report, an extract from which he has given me in proof sheets. I will make it a part of my remarks. It is as follows:

COMPENSATION OF SUPERINTENDENTS AND SURFMEN.

In the estimates of appropriations required by the Life-Saving Service for the current year, an increase of $900 in the salaries of each of three of the district superintendents was submitted, the reasons for the recommendation being stated in a note appended to the estimates, as follows:

"The salaries of the superintendents of the First, Second, and Fifth districts, for an increase in which, of $300 each, an estimate is submitted, were fixed at the present rates by the act of May 4, 1882. At that time the number of stations in the First district were 7; in the Second, 15; and in the Fifth, 11. The bonds which they were then required to give amounted, respectively, to $20,000, $25,000, and $25,000. Since then the number of stations in these districts has been increased, so that there are now in the First district 12 stations, in the Second, 23, and in the Fifth, 17, and other stations are authorized by law to be established in each. The sums of money which now have to be placed in the hands of these officers for disbursement have made it necessary to exact additional bonds, which now amount, respectively, to $30,000, $50,000, and $40,000. The fact that the First district includes a smaller number of stations than the other two is fully offset by the greater extent of territory which it embraces, and the additional hardships and privations that must be endured on account of the severity of the winters in this latitude in making the required visits to the stations. The wide separation of the stations from each other and their great distance from the superintending office also largely increase the difficulties of exercising proper supervision. The present compensation of the three superintendents above referred to is entirely inadequate to the duties they perform, and the proposed increase would put them more nearly on an equal footing with the superintendents of the other districts."

This estimate was approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and submitted to Congress. The increase recommended would have involved an addition of $900 to the annual expenditures. Congress, however, appropriated a uniform rate of $1,600 per annum as compensation for each of the 12 district superintendents embraced in the service, reducing the salaries of 8 of them $200 each below the rate established by the act of May 4, 1882, and increasing those of 4 $100 each; a net reduction of $1,200 per annum. This action inflicted serious injustice upon 8 deserving officers already underpaid and fell short of doing justice to 3 of the remaining 4, while it extended to the fourth an unsolicited and unnecessary increase.

With the exception of the officer last referred to, who has charge of the Seventh district, in which there are but two stations manned by crews (the remaining nine being merely houses of refuge in charge of keepers only), all the superintendents have duties of a very onerous, responsible, and exacting character. They are charged with the direct control and management of the service in their respective districts, which duties include the selection and nomination of the station keepers, the supervision of the selection of the crews by the keepers (which, under the law, must be made with exclusive reference to fitness), the enforcement of proper discipline, the instruction and drilling of the crews, the ascertainment of the needs of the stations as to appliances, equipments, and supplies, making requisition for what is wanted, etc., and as paymasters of their respective districts they are required to disburse large amounts of public funds on account of which the heavy bonds specified in the above note are exacted.

The mere accounting and clerical work incident to the performance of these duties is sufficient to occupy nearly or quite all of their time, and most of them have to employ clerical assistance at their own expense to enable them to make their required visits to the stations. But it is obvious that the clerical work is of minor importance compared with their other duties, and calls into exercise the least important of their qualifications, the chief of which are necessarily of an exceptional character, involving a technical knowledge of surfmanship and life-saving methods not often found combined with the requisite business training. Furthermore, the possession of good judgment, sound discretion, unswerving integrity, uncompromising moral courage, and a standing in the community that commands respect and confidence are indispensable. To these considerations should be added the fact that these officers, in their official routine, are exposed to hardships and dangers which do not fall to the lot of ordinary officeholders.

During the active season, which embraces the most inclement portions of the year, they have to make frequent visits to the several stations in their respective districts, in most instances extending hundreds of miles along desolate and inhospitable coasts and distant from railroad facilities, often through storms and drifting snows, sometimes camping out and subsisting upon rough fare, frequently making their way in small boats upon dangerous waters, and always under circumstances as widely at variance as is conceivable with the comforts and luxuries of ordinary travel. They are, moreover, frequently summoned by the keepers to trying scenes of shipwrecks where all efforts at rescue have proved fruitless and inevitable failure seems imminent, and on these occasions they assume command. In several such instances successful issues have resulted. But their heroic struggles are not always so rewarded, nor are the hardships and perils of their calling always encountered with impunity. Out of the small number of these officers two have perished by drowning, one has escaped that fate only by mere chance, after prolonged suffering in the water, and one has died from exposure.

It is submitted that it is neither right nor creditable to a great nation to dole out to men like these a paltry pittance of compensation that hardly affords them a decent livelihood. All of those for whom an increase of pay is herein recommended have the supervision of a large number of men—the keepers and crews of the stations in their respective districts—in one district 328, and an average in the 11 districts in question of 160. To other official positions, involving the supervision of even a smaller force of employees and having no responsibility in the disbursement of public funds, has been attached a compensation of $2,500 or $3,000 per annum, and it would seem that the smaller of these sums, at least, should be accorded to those under consideration.

Mr. Kimball is good authority, and knows the situation thoroughly. He thinks the district superintendents are not paid in proportion to other officers of the Government. They take large responsibilities and perform arduous labor. They are among the most trusted and responsible officers of the Government.

Mr. SAYERS. Did I understand the gentleman to state that the superintendent of the district to which he refers has no assistant?

Mr. McCORMICK. No; I did not mean that. I believe he has an assistant for Rhode Island.

Mr. SAYERS. For that district there is a superintendent, and also an assistant superintendent.

Mr. McCORMICK. According to the statement in this bill, yes.

Mr. NORTHWAY. These superintendents have nothing to do with the life-saving work, have they? They do not venture out upon the water, do they.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; often. In case of extremity they are always sent for.

Mr. NORTHWAY. They simply superintend the various stations, do they not?

Mr. McCORMICK. They superintend the stations, and are called out in case of emergency—are frequently called out. There are two instances, I believe, in which superintendents' lives were lost by exposure in rescue work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York have five minutes additional time.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMICK. I do not know that I shall want five minutes. I simply wish to add, in conclusion, that it is the general sentiment of the Department having control of this service that these men are inadequately paid and have always been inadequately paid. It is the opinion that the salaries should not have been reduced last year. The complaint may not have reached the ears of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, but it has reached my ears, and I pledged myself to my constituents that I would endeavor in every way to have these salaries restored. Some of the new members may not know that this is a nonpolitical office. It is political in no sense of the term. Under the law it can not be political. The occupant of the office in my district is not of my party, and has never been in sympathy with me politically. But I recognize that he is a responsible man, performing valuable service, for which he is very poorly paid, and I believe we ought not to follow a bad precedent in this matter; that we ought not to follow what may have been done by a former Congress, but do right and act justly and fairly in behalf of men who rank among the bravest that we have in the public service.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. May I ask the gentleman from New York a question?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I understood by the question asked by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] that these officers are not subjected to any danger of life in the performance of their duties. I did not hear the gentleman's reply.

Mr. McCORMICK. I answered to the contrary. I answered that they were called to assist the life-saving crews in cases of emergency, and that there was a record at the Treasury Department of the loss of lives of superintendents in the performance of duty in connection with shipwrecks.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Just one question. The gentleman said this was not a political office.

Mr. McCORMICK. It is not.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Perhaps if it were made a political office the salary would be raised.

Mr. McCORMICK. Perhaps it would. It is a thoroughly nonpolitical office, and, as I have said, the superintendent in my district is not of my party.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one superintendent for the coasts of Maine and New Hampshire, $1,600.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "six," in line 20, and insert the word "eight," in order to test this question.

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois on the point of order.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman stated the law to me correctly, there is no ground for a point of order. The gentleman told me the salary was $1,800.

Mr. CANNON. In charge of a bill of this kind, calling on my recollection, even when reenforced by a man who rarely makes a mistake—I refer to the clerk of the committee—I am liable to be mistaken now and then. I inquired what they were in the bill before this decrease was made, and his general recollection and mine was that my statement was justified; but when the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCORMICK] rises in his place and challenges the correctness of that statement, I find the enabling act, and if the gentleman wants to know what these salaries are I will read it:

But hereafter all district superintendents of life-saving stations shall be disbursing officers, * * * and the compensation of superintendents of the districts herein named shall be as follows: For the first district, embracing the coasts of Maine and New Hampshire, $1,500.

That is the act of 1882.

Mr. LOUD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I want to introduce the amendment again.

Mr. McCORMICK. I renew the amendment raising it to $1,800 for the coast of the district of Rhode Island and Long Island—striking out $1,600 and inserting $1,800. That is the salary now fixed by law; and that is all I ask.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York only to make a pro forma amendment——

Mr. McCORMICK. I move this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing.) To strike out the last word. The gentleman's amendment will be in order when the committee shall have reached that paragraph. That paragraph to which the gentleman from New York spoke has not yet been reached by the Clerk in the reading. We are now on the paragraph on which the gentleman from California has renewed the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I renew the amendment of my colleague from California; and before the Chair rules upon any point of order I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if the law that he read just now as being the law covering this salary is the law that applies.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; I so understand it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Well, now, I would like to inquire of the gentleman why it is that he has reduced the salary from $1,800 to $1,600?

Mr. CANNON. I will be very glad if by unanimous consent I can tell the gentleman. My understanding is that this act of 1882 fixed certain salaries at $1,500 and in three or four districts at $1,800 a year. Now, that bred much complaint. The $1,800 men wanted to keep the $1,800, and the $1,500 men stated they were doing just as much service and that they should all receive the same or that these others should come down. Now, my understanding is that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] took this matter up a couple years ago and looked into it and equalized these salaries. He recommended the appropriations, and it was recommended in the appropriation bill and not in a law. It is the law for the last year. Now, for Maine and New Hampshire the appropriation is $1,600. That is more than the law provided by $100. For coast of Massachusetts $1,600. That is $100 more than the law. For one superintendent for the coasts of Rhode Island and Long Island, $1,600. That is $200 less than the law. In other words, he equalized them according to the recommendation of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, no; oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. One other point I wish to——

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw that latter remark; but no doubt it seemed to be just to equalize the pay, and it has been done for two years. Now, that is all I desire to say.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I would like to inquire, a little further, why, on page 13, line 1, which provides for one assistant, the salary is fixed at $1,200?

Mr. CANNON. That is an assistant superintendent.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is the reason?

Mr. CANNON. He is an assistant superintendent.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then, as I understand it, these are salaries which are fixed by an appropriation bill and not by law.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; they are fixed by a law.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, after the explanation given by the gentleman from Illinois, I fail to see any merit in the point of order. Either we have a right to raise this salary to $1,800 or we have no right to raise it at all. Of course I shall not make any point of order, but the salary is altogether too small.

Mr. McCORMICK. We have a right to raise it to $1,800, because that is the existing law, while there is no law authorizing us to raise it to $1,600.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, what is the pending proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the amendment of the gentleman from California increasing this salary from $1,600, as proposed in the bill, to $1,800.

Mr. CANNON. And on that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the point of order is pending.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, and I am endeavoring to convince the Chair that the point of order is not good. Who shall decide when doctors disagree? I suppose the patient. Here we have two gentlemen of equal learning in these matters; one of them, the gentleman from Illinois, tells us that the salary fixed by law is $1,500, while the other, the gentleman from New York, says it is $1,800.

Mr. BINGHAM. They are referring to different paragraphs in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Well, I frankly confess that I do not see anything in the point of order. If the gentleman from New York is correct and the law makes this salary $1,800, why can not we raise the appropriation to that amount?

Mr. McCORMICK. That is the law now.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair desires to see the law, I will send it up.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary. On the statement of the gentleman in charge of the bill that the salary fixed by law is $1,500, the Chair will hold that the amendment is obnoxious to the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one superintendent for the coasts of Rhode Island and Long Island, $1,600.

Mr. McCORMICK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that that salary be raised to $1,800 in accordance with existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the existing law.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is correct about it. I hold the existing law in my hand, and it provides $1,500 for Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, I believe, but provides $1,800 for the Rhode Island and Long Island district.

Mr. McCORMICK. And for Virginia, North Carolina, the Lake Ontario district, Lake Huron——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word on this amendment. I make it a rule to support bills coming from committees of which I have the honor to be a member, and therefore it is with some hesitation that I rise to support the amendment of my colleague from New York [Mr. McCORMICK]. I am somewhat familiar with the coasts of Long Island and of Rhode Island, and there are certain peculiar reasons why the salary of the superintendent of that district should be raised to the old standard of $1,800 instead of being allowed to remain at the lesser sum of $1,600. Gentlemen of the committee will bear in mind that all the great transatlantic liners must pass along the coast of Long Island, and that nearly all the great wrecks of the year are on that coast; so that it is of the greatest importance to the commercial and maritime interests of this country that the men intrusted with life-saving duties along that perilous coast should be adequately paid, and it seems to me that this little increase of $200 asked for those hardy seafaring men who risk their lives through every season of the year is one that should be granted by this committee without any division.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to add only a word. These superintendents of the life-saving service are doubtless very worthy and meritorious officers. The law was passed in 1882, and since that time it has been developed that the best interests of the service require the equalization of the salaries; so the $1,500 men have been put up to $1,600, and one or two or three of the $1,800 men have been put down to $1,600. Now, I make no point of order on the $1,600 people. I could, but I do not. But the gentleman from New York seeks now to come in with an amendment to raise these salaries to $1,800. I am not here to say that the salaries are extravagant, but $1,600 in cool cash is not a bad salary for most men. I worked many a year for one-third of the amount and part of the time for one-quarter of the amount.

Mr. BINGHAM. That was when you were young.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; when I was young, and therefore when I could do twice as much work as I can do now, and it is above the average salary for similar talent throughout the United States. I am not, however, opposed to this salary of $1,600. Now, the superintendent of any one of these life-saving stations is, after all, quite as well paid as are the surfmen, who get but $60 a month, and who, taking their lives in their hands, go out in their boats and actually do the rescuing. Those are the men who save the lives. And, sir, whenever I have voted for the appropriation of $60 a month (the sum fixed by law) for those men, who in case of shipwreck actually do the work of bringing in crew or passengers through the billows, I have always felt that this was tolerably small compensation. I have said all I want to say about this matter.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman vote to raise the salaries of the surfmen?

Mr. CANNON. I am here in charge of an appropriation bill that is presumed to be in pursuance of existing law—a bill upon which the rules will not allow me to cut down extravagant salaries—a bill which, in simple justice to the House and to the committee, I must insist shall conform to the law. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] will bring in a bill from the Committee on Commerce to increase the salaries of these surfmen and will ask the House to adopt that bill upon its own merits I will vote for it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The pay of these men was increased two years ago.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; they have been increased somewhat.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have before the House a bill increasing the salaries of these surfmen, and I shall be glad to vote for such increase as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I was authorized by the Committee on Commerce at its last meeting to report to this House a measure fixing the salaries of these superintendents (with the exception of one district) at $2,100 per annum, and to fix the monthly pay of surfmen at $65. That report will be submitted to-morrow. It is based largely on the recommendations of the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service, who, in his last annual report (which is accessible to every member), states that upon the basis of the salaries of other public officers these district superintendents ought to receive from $2,500 to $3,000. They have a large number of stations to visit, and they must do this in inclement weather. They are required to pay out of their salaries a considerable amount as clerk hire. When a wreck occurs, if it is of any magnitude, the first thing which the local superintendent or the light-house keeper does is to send word to the district superintendent, who, if it is at all possible, goes to the scene of the wreck and takes charge personally of the relief force. As a matter of example, if for no other reason, he is often required under such circumstances to show the most sublime courage, as is always done when the occasion demands it. Two of these district superintendents have lost their lives in the performance of their duties, and another received such injuries that he subsequently died therefrom.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says that it has been deemed wise to equalize these salaries. That is perhaps true but the revision has been entirely in the wrong direction. It is such a revision as has never been recommended by the officers having jurisdiction of this branch of the public service. The last bill which was passed by this House, introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Texas, and based upon recommendations of the Treasury Department, fixed the salary of this superintendent at $1,800, and raised the salaries of four others, who were receiving a less amount, to this sum.

That bill having passed the House, the Senate, without debate, and without any recommendation from anybody connected with the service so far as the records disclose, changed the bill so as to appropriate only $1,600 as the amount of these salaries. So far as appears in the RECORD no reason whatever was given for reducing the salaries of these superintendents. Since these salaries were fixed at the figures named by the gentleman from Illinois the number of life-saving stations has largely increased and the amount of money disbursed is far greater than at the time of the passage of the act of 1882. There is every reason why these officers should receive more liberal compensation.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. McCORMICK, it was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one superintendent for the coast of New Jersey, $1,600.

Mr. WANGER. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "six" and inserting "eight"; so as to make the salary of this superintendent $1,800.

Mr. CANNON. If in the case of any one of these officers whose salary is fixed by law at $1,800 the appropriation is increased to that amount, a similar increase ought to be made in every case where the law gives the same amount of pay. Let the vote be taken, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] desires to say something.

Mr. WANGER. Nothing except that the New Jersey district is one of the largest in the service.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the statute fix the salary in this case at $1,800?

Mr. WANGER. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one superintendent for the coasts of Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, $1,600.

Mr. WANGER. I move to amend this paragraph so as to increase the appropriation to $1,800.

Mr. CANNON. I am not going to move to reduce the appropriation named in the bill nor am I going to make a point of order on the amendment. But the legal salary of this officer is only $1,500.

Mr. WANGER. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MILES. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what is the amount fixed by law as the salary of the superintendent for the coasts of Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia?

Mr. CANNON. I am informed that the pay is $1,500 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one superintendent of the coasts of Virginia and North Carolina, $1,600.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 13, line 8, by striking out the word "six" and inserting "eight"; so that it will read "$1,800."

Mr. CANNON. The law seems to fix this at $1,800.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one superintendent for the life-saving and lifeboat stations on the coasts of Lakes Ontario and Erie, $1,600.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "six," in line 17, on page 13, and make it "eight"; so as to read "$1,800."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one superintendent for the life-saving and lifeboat stations on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, $1,600.

Mr. CROWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "one thousand," in line 13, on page 13, strike out "six" and insert "eight"; so as to read "on the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, $1,800."

Mr. CANNON. Well, the law fixes $1,500 for this salary, just as in those other cases where the law fixes the same salary, and it has been increased to sixteen hundred. No effort has been made to go beyond that. I trust the gentleman will not offer the amendment. I will be compelled to make the point of order upon it.

Mr. CROWLEY. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order for a little while?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly. But what I mean to say to the gentleman is that the others are fixed by law at $1,500, and stand on precisely the same footing. They have been allowed $1,600 in this bill, and if you increase this to $1,800 we will have to go back and put all on the same footing.

Mr. CROWLEY. With all due deference to the farmer from Illinois, who knows more of a bicycle than he does of the Life-Saving Service [laughter], I want to say to him that this particular superintendent does more work than any man in the United States. He has the entire coast district from the Rio Grande River to Florida—the entire Gulf Coast. He is always on duty, always ready and willing to do what is right, and certainly deserves a better salary than the meager compensation allowed to him.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] jumps up every time an amendment is offered, and, with might and main, makes the point of order. If he had to undergo the examination that this particular superintendent underwent to obtain his position, he would not stand "deuce high." [Laughter.] I will guarantee that there are not ten members on the floor of this House to-day who can stand the examination required for one of these positions of superintendent of the life-saving service. Besides that, they must give a bond running all the way from $10,000 to $50,000.

Now, why should you make fish of one and flesh of the other? Here is a man who does more of this work than any other man in the Service, and the gentleman says the law makes the salary $1,500. If a man in Maryland, or Massachusetts, or New York, or elsewhere gets $1,800 for the same work, what is the matter with the man from Texas obtaining the same amount of money? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the law of 1882 fixed the salary of these superintendents, dividing them into two grades at $1,800 and certain others at $1,500 a year. The $1,500 salaries are increased, without law, to $1,600, and they are just now putting the $1,800 people back to what they are entitled to under law.

Now, this Galveston keeper is getting, under this appropriation, $100 more than he is entitled to. I am quite sure I am not going to agonize about these appropriations, either $100 more or $100 less; but if this man is increased $200 more than he has been already increased, then, in simple justice, we ought to go back and take all of the others and do the same for them.

I thank my friend from Texas, a superior man, a scientific man, a man who is competent to come to Congress by civil-service examination, and who at the same time could stand the examination which would authorize him to occupy a position in the Life-Saving Service—I thank him for his kindly remarks about me. It does not hurt me, and may elect him. Try it over. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. I am compelled to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order; and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one superintendent for the life-saving and lifeboat stations on the coasts of Lakes Huron and Superior, $1,600.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "six," in line 20, and insert "eight"; so as to make it read "$1,800."

Mr. CANNON. The law fixes it at $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For one superintendent for the life-saving and lifeboat stations on the coast of Lake Michigan, $1,600.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Chairman, in line 22 I move to strike out the word "six" and insert the word "eight."

Mr. CANNON. The law fixes that salary at $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For one superintendent for the life-saving and lifeboat stations on the coasts of Washington, Oregon, and California, $1,600; in all, $20,300.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "six," in line 1, page 14, and insert the word "eight."

Mr. CANNON. The law fixes that salary at $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, will it not be necessary to change the total of that paragraph?

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the Clerk may correct the total.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the Clerk may rearrange the total in accordance with the amendments agreed to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For pay of crews of surfmen employed at the life-saving and lifeboat stations, including the old Chicago station, during the period of actual employment; compensation of volunteers at life-saving and lifeboat stations, for actual and deserving service rendered upon any occasion of disaster or in any effort to save persons from drowning, at such rate, not to exceed $10 for each volunteer, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine; pay of volunteer crews for drill and exercise; fuel for stations and houses of refuge; repairs and outfits for same; rebuilding and improvement of same; supplies and provisions for houses of refuge and for shipwrecked persons succored at stations; traveling expenses of officers under orders from the Treasury Department; commutation of quarters for officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service detailed for duty in the Life-Saving Service; for carrying out the provisions of sections 7 and 8 of the act approved May 4, 1882; for draft animals and their maintenance, and contingent expenses, including freight, storage, repairs to apparatus, labor, medals, stationery, newspapers for statistical purposes, advertising, and miscellaneous expenses that can not be included under any other head of life-saving stations on the coasts of the United States, $1,248,290.

For establishing new life-saving stations and lifeboat stations on the sea and lake coasts of the United States, authorized by law, $40,000.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he is willing now to entertain a motion to increase the salaries of surfmen from $60 to $65—in other words, to put the salaries back to what they formerly were?

Mr. CANNON. What is the salary fixed by law?

Mr. WANGER. If the gentleman will allow me, the pay of surfmen, under a recent provision of the Revised Statutes, is $65 per month, provided their services do not continue longer than nine and a half months. Where they are longer than that, the surfmen are only paid $60 per month, in accordance with a previous act of Congress. The result will be that, by raising the pay of all of them to $65 per month, no matter how long they serve, very little additional money will be required, owing to the fact that most of these stations are not open more than nine months. Only in very rare instances do they reach the full limit of nine and a half months. The effect of the law as it exists at this time is that where the stations are open the entire year, or more than nine and a half months, the men who stay throughout the entire year can only get $60 a month, while men who resign from the force in the summer, and go into private employment and earn $100, $150, or even $250, running fishing parties and sailing their own craft, come back in the fall, and during the time while they are in the Service get $65 per month. The result is a bad feeling among the men, which, in the judgment of the Treasury officials, is not warranted by the small amount of money involved. My recollection is the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service is unable to estimate just how many men are cut off under the present law.

Mr. McCORMICK. Complaint has been made that the pay of these men has not been restored. It has been my purpose from the beginning to ask to have it restored to $65 per month, which is little enough, and I now ask the chairman of the committee whether he will agree that the pay of these life-saving crews shall be so restored? The reduction was the cause of great complaint along the whole coast. The men serve for about eight months in the year. It is not as though they were employed the entire year; and as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just said, the fact that extra men may be brought on who get $65 per month for a part of the time, while the regular employees get only $60, is a constant aggravation. Some of these men came to me before I came to Washington, asking that this restoration be made at this session as an act of simple justice. Of course we should not restore the pay of superintendents and neglect the crews. I am sure you would not object to this if you knew as I do, and as those who live on the coast do, the danger and hardship to which these brave and faithful men are exposed winter after winter and year after year, often taking their lives in their hands.

Mr. CANNON. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the committee.

Mr. McCORMICK. I ask the gentleman whether he will agree to this change?

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the pay of surfmen shall be at the rate of $65 per month, no matter what portion of the year they may be employed.

Mr. CANNON. To that amendment I make the point of order, and upon the point of order I will read the law. I had no recollection about the law, but I inquired of a gentleman who is rarely mistaken about these matters. It was enacted since the provision in the Revised Statutes was enacted. The matter was considered, and the bill was passed last year, in 1895.

Mr. WANGER. I wish to say that when I said Revised Statutes I should have said an appropriation bill.

Mr. SAYERS. No; it was not on an appropriation bill. It was by an independent statute.

Mr. CANNON (reading):

The proviso of section 1 of the act approved August 3, 1894, is hereby amended, so as to read as follows:

"Provided, That those surfmen who enlisted for a term including more than eight and a half months in that service and those who have enlisted to fill vacancies caused from the promotion, death, resignation, or dismissal of such surfmen shall receive $60 per month during said period of active service."

Now, this bill provides the money to pay in pursuance of the law, and therefore I make the point of order upon the gentleman's amendment, not that it may not have merit, but it is not the right place to legislate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask how far the Clerk has read?

The CHAIRMAN. Up to and including line 7, on page 15.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 7664, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. Pending the announcement the Chair submits the following requests of members:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STAHLE, for five days, on account of business.

To Mr. CROWTHER, for ten days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. TATE to withdraw from the files of the House the proofs in support of the bill (H. R. 3706) of the Fifty-third Congress to increase the pension of Rodney F. McDonald, no adverse report having been made thereon.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 31, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, REV. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Nashville, Tenn., remonstrating against a further continuance of the discussions in Congress on international questions, and praying for a wise and careful consideration of our currency and finances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BURROWS presented a petition of Kalamazoo Lodge, No. 387, International Association of Machinists, of Kalamazoo, Mich., praying for an investigation of the treatment of employees in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Navy-Yard and other navy-yards of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of Charles Flowers and 43 other citizens of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the appropriation of public money for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Commercial Club of Duluth, Minn., praying that the bill to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota shall provide for the free passage over the bridge of all foot passengers, bicycle riders, wagons, and vehicles of all kinds; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Grand Army of the Republic of the State of Minnesota, praying for the passage of House bill No. 4339, to establish a national military park to commemorate the campaign, siege, and defense of Vicksburg; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Grand Army of the Republic of the State of Minnesota, praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a memorial of Linton Loyal Orange Lodge, No. 315, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the appropriation of money for sectarian institutions; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of Highland Grange, No. 261, Patrons of Husbandry, of Oregon, praying for the passage of House bill No. 2626, providing for the protection of agricultural staples by an export bounty; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of Miss Mary Hayne, of Washington, D. C., praying that she be granted a pension on account of services rendered as hospital nurse at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ELKINS presented the memorial of John M. Crowe and 73 other citizens of West Virginia, remonstrating against the continuance of the statue of Père Marquette in Statuary Hall, and praying that it be immediately removed; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. VILAS presented a petition of the Free Methodist Church of Plattsville, Wis., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. F. B. Williams and 35 other citizens of Trim Belle, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation giving to second-class mail matter, such as religious tracts, full advantage of the act of July 16, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORT OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 289) for the relief of Ames & Detrick, of San Francisco, in the State of California, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1831) for the relief of William J. Bryan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1734) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah H. Wood, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment submitted on the 10th instant, proposing to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to contract with The John P. Holland Torpedo Boat Company, of New York, for six submarine torpedo boats of the Holland type, intended to be proposed to the naval appropriation bill, to report a substitute therefor. I ask that the original amendment be indefinitely postponed, and that the amendment reported in lieu of it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6833) defining the standard shape and size for dry measures in use in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAFFERY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 71) for the relief of the Catholic Church at Macon City, Mo., reported it without amendment.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3281) to authorize reassessments for improvements and general taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 112) donating a condemned cannon and some shells to the Guilford Battle Ground Company, near Greensboro, N. C., reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2679) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of F. Z. Tucker, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 2680) granting a pension to Edgar L. Beckwith;

A bill (S. 2681) granting an increase of pension to Charles Wallace;

A bill (S. 2682) granting an increase of pension to Oscar Abbott;

A bill (S. 2683) granting an increase of pension to Felton D. Edson;

A bill (S. 2684) granting a pension to James Smith;

A bill (S. 2685) granting a pension to Mary Picard;

A bill (S. 2686) granting a pension to Charles E. Locke;

A bill (S. 2687) granting an increase of pension to George W. Neely;

A bill (S. 2688) granting a pension to John C. Reed;

A bill (S. 2689) granting an increase of pension to Octavia F. Crews; and

A bill (S. 2690) restoring a pension to Hubbard W. Goodrich.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 2691) for the relief of George E. Zimmerman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2692) to amend the act authorizing the Washington and Marlboro Electric Railway Company of Maryland to extend its lines into and within the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 2693) granting jurisdiction to the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of the United States of certain State claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MANTLE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

UNSURVEYED PUBLIC LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution proposing to direct the Committee on Public Lands to inquire and report such legislation, by bill or otherwise, as may be necessary to prevent the unsurveyed lands of the United States from being approved and patented without a survey, etc.

Mr. CALL. I should be very glad to have the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over without prejudice.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I call up the privileged question, being the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the claim of Mr. Du Pont.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon from the Committee on Privileges and Elections February 18, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry A. Du Pont is entitled to a seat in the Senate from the State of Delaware for the full term commencing March 4, 1895.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish, before I commence my speech, to acknowledge the courtesy of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] in allowing the case to be postponed until such time when I hoped my physical condition would be better than it was some days ago. I wish also to say that those Senators who desire to follow me in my remarks would do well to have a pamphlet copy of the constitution of Delaware before them.

This case is one of very great importance, not only to the person who seeks to be seated in this body, but also to the people of Delaware, whose Senator he claims to be, and, I might also add, of very supreme importance to the people of the United States, as in it is involved the determination of a question which seriously affects our institutions in a very material point.

It will help to understand the argument which I shall make, because I shall make nothing but a law argument, if I shall in the beginning clear away somewhat the mist that has been thrown around this case by a reference to and reliance on two principles which have cut a very large figure in the majority report of the committee, and also in the very able, elaborate, and carefully prepared speech of the Senator from Oregon.

Great reliance has been placed upon the common-law rule in relation to the incompatibility of offices. Great reliance has also been placed upon a supposed principle said and claimed to be a fundamental principle of our American system; that is, a necessary division of the powers of government into three distinct and separate and independent departments—executive, judicial, and legislative. It will be seen before I get through, by those who shall honor me by their attention, that whilst the validity of these two principles are not denied by me, their importance has been very much magnified by those who advocate the seating of Mr. Du Pont.

A consideration of those parts of the constitution of Delaware which refer most directly to the case involved will show that in its provisions with relation to the holding of incompatible offices no force is given to the supposed common-law rule of incompatibility. It will be found that provisions are made denying the simultaneous exercise of two offices under the constitution of Delaware. I say provisions are made in reference to that point which have no reference to their supposed incompatibility at common law. It will also be found that in the same provisions there is an utter ignoring, a contemptuous disregard, if I may use the expression, of the supposed great fundamental principle said to arise out of our American system.

It may be as well to state to the Senate in the beginning of the argument that there is no incompatibility at common law between the exercise of legislative and executive powers by the same officer. On the contrary, the union of the two in the same person is more a principle of the common law than the rule of exclusion to which Senators on the other side refer. The King of Great Britain is a part of the legislature of that country. In the enactment of laws the phrase by which the legislature expresses its wish or will to make a law in England is about in these words: "Be it enacted by His Most Excellent Majesty the King, by and with the advice of the lords temporal and spiritual and his commons," so and so.

That is not all, Mr. President. It is a settled part of the common law of Great Britain not only that the King is a part of the legislature, but that the great executive officers of that Empire must be members of the legislature. The prime minister and all the cabinet are members of the legislature. Lord Coke lived in the days of James I. It was a very dark period in the constitutional history of Great Britain. Lord Coke, who had not only distinction as a lawyer, but for those days was somewhat distinguished for his respect for the rights and liberties of the people of England, was a member of Parliament. It was sought to get rid of this adversary to despotic government, and so the King was induced to appoint him a sheriff of one of the counties. By a rule which has existed in England for a long time, an appointment from the King always vacates the seat of a member of Parliament, not because, as I shall show, there is any incompatibility between the duties and office of a member of Parliament and the office to which the appointment is made. The reason for this vacating of the office is wholly different. It is that he who has accepted the high commission from the people of England as a member of Parliament shall not be in such a condition by accepting an office from the King, that he will be the servitor of the King instead of the servant of his constituents. So the appointment of Lord Coke under that rule vacated his seat in Parliament. But, sir, he was immediately returned, as he had a right to be, as a member for his old district, and when the men who counseled the King to stifle the voice, to destroy the influence of Lord Coke as a member of Parliament resisted his seating again, it was held that there was no incompatibility between the office of sheriff and that of a member of Parliament, and he was seated and served his term out.

Right here it will probably aid to understand the argument which I shall make if I read some short extracts from a work of acknowledged authority upon the subject of the incompatibility at common law of various offices, and it will be seen again that there is no incompatibility arising from this supposed American system of the exclusion from all the other departments of an officer in one.

Before I forget it, I may as well remark that the American rule, as it is called, has no reference whatever to the holding of offices. It is a question of a division of powers, the rule being, as far as it has been observed at all, that persons holding or exercising powers in one department shall not exercise powers in the other. It will be well to remember right here (because this goes along through this whole argument) that when that law, or that supposed law, is violated, it does not have the effect of the common-law rule of incompatibility. The common-law rule is always this in its effect: That where a man holds an office and accepts one incompatible with that, it is an election upon his part to take the second office and to resign the first. But no such consequences have ever been applied or can be applied to this rule growing out of what is called the American system. There when a party or an officer in one department assumes powers in another, as was done by the House of Representatives in the case of Kilbourn, I believe, the rule is not that the officer assuming the exercise of these powers vacates his office but that his assumption is a nullity. He holds his office, but he is prohibited from exercising these other powers. That ought to be borne in mind also as we go along.

I read a short extract from the opinion of the supreme court of New York, in which they hold that at common law, without any constitutional inhibition, there is no incompatibility between a legislative and an executive office:

Nor is the office of a member of the assembly—

The legislature—

in the legal sense of the word, incompatible with that of deputy clerk of the court of sessions of the city of New York.

And here, as a part of this extract, I might read another which overturns the answer which the Senator from Oregon made to a question propounded by me during his very able argument, when he insisted that as one of the tests of the incompatibility of offices there should be a capacity in every instance on the part of the incumbent to exercise both offices. I asked him whether that meant a physical impossibility or something else. He said physical impossibility.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I said physical impossibility might be and often was one element constituting incompatibility.

Mr. GEORGE. I give the Senator the benefit of his explanation, and he will see that thus explained it is not sustained by the authorities:

It may be granted that it was physically impossible for the relator to be present in his seat in the assembly chamber in the performance of his duty as a member of that body and at the same time at his desk in the court doing his duty as deputy clerk.

But it is clearly shown by those opinions that physical impossibility is not that incompatibility spoken of or recognized in law.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. What case is the Senator reading from?

Mr. GEORGE. The People vs. Green.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. From what book?

Mr. GEORGE. Fifty-eighth New York Reports, opinion by Judge Folger, I will read from another section of this book to show the kind of incompatibility which prevents the union of two offices in the same person:

In England it has been held that a justice of the common bench can not be also a justice of the King's bench, because the King's bench corrects the errors of the common bench. But if the chief justice of the common bench is made keeper of the great seal he continues to be justice, and so a justice of the common bench may be chief baron of the exchequer.

In the first instance he is prohibited from holding two offices on the ground that one exercises a supervision and control over the other. I assert now that without exception in well considered cases there is no incompatibility in the offices except when they arise from the subordination of one office to the other whereby one has the right to control, manage, and direct the other; and that, sir, I believe, is the very language of the supreme court of New York in the case to which I have alluded. I will read it:

A man may not be landlord and tenant of the same premises.

Because the landlord controls and manages the tenant.

He may be, however, landlord of one farm and tenant of another, though he may not at the same hour be able to do—

As my friend insists—

the duty of each position. The offices must subordinate one the other, and they must per se have the right to interfere one with the other before they are incompatible at common law.

Great as the powers are of my distinguished friend from Oregon, I think it will exceed them for him to show that there is any subordination between a member of the legislature of a State and the governor of that State.

Now, sir, I go a little further on to this supposed great principle of the American system. In the first place, I feel warranted in saying that no such principle exists except as the result of a written constitution establishing it. A fact must be borne in mind which sometimes occurred to me when I listened to the very able and ingenious argument of my friend from Oregon, that we are here construing a constitution, not making one. If this was a convention assembled for the purpose of framing a constitution, then it would be quite competent, quite in order, quite the thing for members of the convention to remind the body that there is a propriety in having three distinct departments of the Government and confining the powers of each to a separate magistracy; but when we come to construe a written constitution we must find what that constitution does, not what it ought to do, in order for it to square with our notions of what may be the proper method by which constitutions should be framed.

I desire here to say that this supposed rule of the American system has not been recognized in a single constitution that has ever been framed in the United States of America. It has been ignored, disregarded, from the very beginning until now. I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon and those who agree with him to the very first constitution for the United States of America, the Articles of Confederation. In those articles there were no judicial powers conferred. In those articles the executive and legislative powers were all in the same body, there was no distinction, and if it be true, as my friend from Oregon seems to think, that the freedom and liberty of this people, the perpetuity of our free institutions, were dependent upon the recognition of this principle, I desire to call his attention to the fact that the very first effort made on the American Continent to establish free institutions utterly ignored this. That constitution was not entirely satisfactory, I admit.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I was about to suggest that.

Mr. GEORGE. It was not entirely satisfactory, but it did not destroy liberty. It was the only governmental agency by which the freedom and independence of this people were secured.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GEORGE. Of course.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I wish to call his attention to the fact that even in the first constitution our forefathers made there was not one word upon the subject of the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press.

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It became necessary to amend the Constitution in order to guard the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press.

Mr. GEORGE. I suppose we have made some improvements, but, sir, in the constitution of the Confederacy—I do not mean to refer to our late government in the Southern States—there was no power granted which could interfere with the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press. They only had express powers; there were no implied powers; and it was unnecessary in that great instrument to deny that which could not be assumed.

Mr. President, coming shortly after that there was another great instrument, the exemplar of free constitutional governments in the States of this Union, called the Ordinance of 1787, by which the magnificent territory which the mother of States and statesmen donated to this Union was governed. In that ordinance, in the first place, who was the legislature? The governor and the judges are constituted the legislature. Was liberty stricken down in that great part of our country by that provision? I admit that was temporary; I have no concealment to make; but, sir, when they come in that same instrument to form a permanent government for the Northwest Territory, what provision did they make? The governor, the council, and the assembly were the legislature, all united, the governor exercising legislative powers just as he did in some other cases to which I shall call the Senator's attention.

So in the two first great grand instruments which were formed in this country for the purpose of establishing free institutions, one for the nation at large and the other for local communities, there was an intermingling and intermixing of legislative, executive, and judicial powers.

I come now to the Constitution of the United States. In the days during which it was being discussed before the American people whether they would accept the Constitution which had been framed by the convention of 1787, there were men, like my friend from Oregon, who had an ideal, who had learned from the Frenchman Montesquieu that there must be, in order to have free institutions, a complete and perfect and absolute separation of the three great departments—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. Those men, like my friend in his eloquent peroration to his magnificent address to the Senate, thought that if this great principle was violated there was an end to freedom in this country. So they opposed the ratification of the Constitution upon the ground that it utterly ignored, utterly repudiated, this so-called principle of the American system. I think, if I remember correctly, though it has been a long while ago, in these exciting times, since my attention has been called to the fathers of the Republic, but I have a sort of indistinct memory—it may be but the memory of a tradition—that James Madison knew something about how to frame a constitution for a free people. So he, in the forty-seventh number of the Federalist, and in subsequent numbers, written and published to the people of the United States for the purpose of meeting objections to the ratification of the Constitution which had been submitted to them, noticed this objection, and he modifies the statement somewhat as put out by the friends of Montesquieu, and he put it in this way, and as he puts it I accept it as the American principle. He says that this maxim of Montesquieu can not amount to more than this, that the same hand which possessed the whole powers of one department shall not be allowed to exercise the whole powers of another department.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me right there to interrupt him?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Conceding that to be the correct interpretation of the doctrine—and for the sake of argument I grant it—Mr. Watson while exercising the office of governor, the Senator from Mississippi will admit, of course, exercised the whole power.

Mr. GEORGE. Every bit of it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Every bit of it. And when he left the exercise of that office, or rather left the office, and went into the joint assembly on the 9th day of May, 1895, did he not, by his controlling vote, exercise the whole power of that assembly for the purposes of the election of a Senator?

Mr. GRAY. That is very easy to answer.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me answer that question. He exercised the whole power, just as any other man who voted on the same side.

Mr. GRAY. That is it.

Mr. GEORGE. I will go along with Mr. Madison. I do this, Mr. President, because it is easier to bring the short notes of Mr. Madison upon the various State constitutions then existing than to bring bodily here those constitutions and read them and comment on them to the Senate. Mr. Madison, in answer to these objectors, to these men who saw nothing in these incompatible, as they called them, provisions of the Constitution of the United States but destruction to freedom and to liberty and to independence, called attention to the State constitutions then existing. Referring to the constitution of New Hampshire, he said:

The president—

The governor was then called president in the State of New Hampshire—who is the head of the executive department, is presiding officer of the senate, and besides an equal vote in all cases, and has a casting vote in the case of a tie.

So, if my friend from Oregon is right in the suggestion that, because Mr. Watson voted, that vote prevented Mr. Du Pont from getting into the United States Senate, here is the case of a governor who voted twice. He not only presided, but on the main proposition, as it went to the body, he voted once, and if that made a tie, then he voted again. Certainly, if the position of my friend from Oregon be correct, liberty had two deathly stabs at the same time and by the same hand under the constitution of New Hampshire.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think myself it was a very bad constitution on that point.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no doubt that my friend thinks so. The truth about it is that my friend has been indulging in these fanciful theories, as put out by Montesquieu, about the proper way of framing a constitution, and he can not get himself down to the duty of construing one.

Mr. Madison said again:

In New York the court of errors—

The highest court—

composed of a senate—

A legislative body—

the judges—

Who had a right to be in the court, according to my friend from Oregon—and the governor.

That is the way those old fathers of ours did in those days, yet I believe we are still a free people.

In New Jersey—

I am quoting now again from Mr. Madison—

the governor is chancellor and ordinary or surrogate of the State, a member of the supreme court of appeals, and president of the senate, with a casting vote in case of a tie.

The men who framed that constitution knew how to unite in the Declaration of Independence, knew how to levy armies, to enlist armies, and to fight for seven long years in order to establish the freedom and independence of this country, and yet, according to the view of the Senator from Oregon, they did not have sense enough to preserve the freedom which they had thus nobly and gallantly won.

Delaware, too, had a constitution in those days—the same State whose fortunes we are now deciding. Says Mr. Madison:

The speakers of the two legislative branches are vice-presidents in the executive department, and the president—

Who is the governor, for they were called "presidents" in those days—is a member of the supreme court of appeals.

And, says Mr. Madison:

Throughout all the States the members of the legislature were justices of the peace.

Now, Mr. President, going back a little to the Constitution of the United States, I remind Senators that we are creatures of that Constitution. This body is organized under the Constitution of the United States. It has only the powers—I hope my friend from Oregon will not forget that—which the Constitution of the United States has given us, and we to-day, at the very moment I am addressing the Chair, are in direct, open, flagrant disregard of the maxim upon which the Senator thinks the freedom and independence and the liberties of these people are conserved. We are a part of the legislative power, yet now we are performing the functions of judge—judicial powers, the highest judicial power, I might say, in the Union, because on its honest, fair, just, and intelligent exercise depends that provision in the Constitution of the United States which alone, of all others, is embedded in our institutions forever, and can not be amended except by the unanimous consent of every State in the Union—equal suffrage in the Senate. That is the question we are trying. That equal suffrage in the Senate is more flagrantly violated by the seating in this body of a man as Senator from the State of Delaware who never had a commission from that State than when a properly constituted elected member may be excluded. One exclusion of a proper man only silences a legal and proper constitutional voice, while the other turns loose into this Chamber a man who has no authority to speak for the people whose Senator he claims to be. He is a usurper.

Mr. President, right here we are performing now an incompatible function, according to the idea of the Senator from Oregon. We are judging when we pronounce judgment that this is the right or that is the right, and when we legislate we ordain that this shall be or shall not be.

The very first words in the Constitution of the United States after the preamble, which is not a part of it, for it is a mere introduction to it, are:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

"All legislative power." What is legislative power? The power that makes laws; and yet, sir, we go to another part of the Constitution, and we find that this Senate and the President of the United States, two-thirds of the Senate concurring, can make treaties. A treaty is not only a compact between the United States and the foreign country with which it is made, but in the language of the Constitution it is "the supreme law of the land." So that is one violation of the maxim. Now, let us take another:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

And yet we here to-day are exercising a judicial power. The House of Representatives exercises a judicial power when it prefers articles of impeachment; and this body exercises a judicial power when it tries the impeachment—so high a judicial power, if I do not misstate it, that the Constitution requires that we Senators, after having once been sworn to discharge the duties of the office of Senator upon our induction into office, are required to be again sworn when we come to try an impeachment.

Then as to the legislative power. I have noted one exception to it, but there is another, and a very important one. Though all legislative power is vested in a Congress of the United States consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives, yet no act concurred in by both can be a law without the approval of the President, unless we overrule him by a vote of two-thirds.

That is but a little of the Constitution. Everybody can remember when he looks through it all these various exceptions. Now I wish to say something of the practice of the Government under it.

In the very beginning of our Government—I forget the exact date—a Chief Justice of the United States was taken from his seat and made to perform the executive act of framing a treaty—Chief Justice Jay. Nobody thought that was a destruction of the Government. Coming down to a later time, right under our own observation, and I find that some two or three years ago two members of this body, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], went, without losing their seats in this body, to the city of Brussels and performed the executive act of entering a conference of representatives from other powers in relation to the monetary system. No objection was made to that.

Let us see what else was done. Only a year or two ago another Senator was taken from this body—the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]—and sent to Paris to sit in an international tribunal to decide a controversy between this country and Great Britain. That was certainly not a legislative act. Whether we call it executive, as carrying out the executive policy of the country, or whether we call it judicial, it was equally inhibited to the Senator from Alabama upon the principles which are put forward here by the Senator from Oregon. And if he shall say, "Oh, it had so much of the legislative about it that we ought to excuse him," then what will the Senator say when I tell him that Mr. Justice Harlan, a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, was sent on the same mission? One of them was there wrongfully, if not both, if the principles of the Senator from Oregon be correct.

Mr. LINDSAY. What about the Venezuelan Commission?

Mr. GEORGE. I almost forgot that Mr. Justice Brewer was appointed on the Venezuelan Commission. I am glad the Senator has called my attention to that. What kind of a power is Mr. Justice Brewer exercising in that Commission to-day? Under an appropriation made and sanctioned by us—I suppose that is clearly an executive power—he is trying to find out something upon which the Executive can act. And if my friend should say it is a judicial act because it is a commission to ascertain facts, then I will call his attention to the colleagues of Judge Brewer, none of whom are judges, but citizens taken at large. If there is anything settled in the constitutional jurisprudence of this country it is that the judicial power or any part of it can never be vested in any single human being unless he be appointed for life.

Now we come down to the State of Delaware, and she, just like the United States and just like every other State in the Union, tramples upon, utterly ignores, this pretended or assumed principle of the Senator from Oregon. Now, let us see. I read from section 8 of Article III of the constitution of Delaware:

No member of Congress nor any person holding or exercising any office under the United States shall at the same time hold or exercise the office of judge, treasurer, attorney-general, secretary, clerk of the supreme court, prothonotary, register for the probate of wills and granting letters of administration, recorder, sheriff, or any office under this State with a salary by law annexed to it.

So when the constitution of Delaware comes to make its prohibitions about holding the same office it pays no attention either to the incompatibility rule at common law or to the supposed American rule upon which the Senator relies. The great point in the constitution of Delaware is that none of those men shall hold an office under the State who gets a salary. That is not in either of the principles relied upon by the Senator.

I go to another clause, more expressive:

No person concerned in any army or navy contract, no member of Congress, or any person holding any office under this State, or the United States, except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice, respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia, holding no disqualifying office, shall, during his continuance in Congress or in office, be a senator or representative.

So, under the constitution of Delaware which I have just read, the attorney-general, who is an executive officer; officers appointed by the courts of justice, who are judicial officers, officers in the militia, who are all executive officers—all of those may be members of the legislature. So they did not follow any rule either of the common law or the supposed American system in their inhibition to double officeholding in the constitution of Delaware.

Then we go to another section, and one to which we are obliged to give a good deal of consideration in this case. It is Article III, section 5. It states that—

No member of Congress, nor person holding any office under the United States, or this State, shall exercise the office of governor.

So when it comes to that there is not the slightest reference either to the common-law rule upon that subject or the supposed rule arising out of the American system. Every officer, executive, judicial, and legislative, is, under that provision of the constitution, taken alone, prohibited from exercising the office of governor in the State of Delaware.

So, Mr. President, I feel authorized in saying that both the common-law rule of incompatibility and the other maxim, or principle, or whatever it may be, arising out of what is called the American system, which prohibits the exercise of powers given one department by a person exercising power in another, are utterly repudiated and ignored in the State of Delaware. It must be noticed—I do not know whether the attention of the Senator from Oregon has been called to it heretofore in the debate—that there is an absence in the constitution of Delaware of the provision found in many of our State constitutions that the powers of government are hereby divided into three distinctive departments, the legislative, executive, judicial, and that a person exercising power in one shall not exercise it over another. There is no such provision in the constitution of Delaware. On the contrary, that principle, or maxim, or whatever you may call it, is utterly ignored and repudiated all through the constitution.

Mr. President, just to show what value courts give to this supposed principle alluded to by the distinguished Senator from Oregon, like that in the State of Delaware, where the constitution transgresses it, I will read a short extract from 2 Cushing's Reports, page 580. Before I read it is well to read a quotation in that opinion from the constitution of Massachusetts to show how very pertinent this is. I read now a quotation from the constitution of Massachusetts:

In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them.

I will now read a phrase that will do my friend's soul good.

To the end—

Says the constitution—

it may be a government of laws and not of men,

With that emphatic declaration in the constitution of Massachusetts, a controversy arose about whether the office of justice of the peace, a judicial office, and the office of constable, an executive office, could be held by the same person, and here is what the court said:

The provisions of this article are general in their terms, expressive only of a principle, and not intended to mark with precision the incompatibility of different offices. The article must have been so understood by the framers of the constitution, as in other parts of that instrument certain offices are enumerated and their incompatibility directly declared.

Exactly what is done in the constitution of Delaware. I think, if I have not been very unfortunate, that the Senate, or those Senators who have done me the honor to listen to me, will find how little, how infinitesimally small these principles so much relied upon by the Senator from Oregon are in this case. In other words, sir, we are remitted, as in good sense and in good logic we ought to acknowledge we are remitted, to the written provisions of the constitution of Delaware itself. What that forbids is forbidden; what that commands must be obeyed. Now let us see what that is. There are three provisions in the constitution of Delaware which are the foundation of all the arguments that have been made. All the balance of the constitution is ancillary thereto. I suppose the Senate understands, for it has been over and over explained here, which I have not done, that the contest here is whether Mr. Watson, having been elected a senator and speaker of the senate in the State of Delaware, upon acceding to the exercise of the office of governor of that State, was in any way disqualified to act as senator. That is the question.

The first provision of the constitution to which I wish to call attention is one which I have already read, but it is right to put it in the RECORD again at this place. Article III, section 5, says:

No member of Congress nor person holding any office under the United States or this State shall exercise the office of governor.

Taking that alone, by itself, it is utterly impossible for any officer, either State or Federal, however high or however low, to exercise the office of governor of the State of Delaware. It is an absolute inhibition against all officers, State and Federal, ever exercising the office of governor of the State of Delaware.

There is another one which I will read, leaving out what my friend will admit has nothing to do with the understanding of the case.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. From what section does the Senator propose to read?

Mr. GEORGE. From section 12, page 27.

No person * * * holding any office under this State, * * * except the attorney-general, officers usually appointed by the courts of justice respectively, attorneys at law, and officers in the militia holding no disqualifying office, shall during his continuance in * * * office be a senator or representative.

I have left out some words which the Senator will admit have nothing to do with the understanding of the case. That is one. With the exception now of these officers specially enumerated, the attorney-general, etc., no officer of the State of Delaware can ever be a member of its legislature, either senator or representative. That is settled.

So we start out with two sections in the constitution of Delaware absolutely interdicting any officer of the United States or the State of Delaware from being governor of the State or from being a senator or representative. If this thing stopped there, there would be some plausibility in Mr. Du Pont's case; but the constitution does not stop there. I will insert here, as it is as good a place as any at which to put it into my remarks, section 14 of Article III of the constitution, which, as I am a little tired, I hope the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] will read for me.

Mr. BATE read as follows:

SEC. 14. Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office, by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If the person elected governor shall die, or become disqualified before the commencement of his term of office, or shall refuse to take the same, the person holding the office shall continue to exercise it until a governor shall be elected and duly qualified. If, upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor, there be no other person who can exercise said office within the provisions of the constitution, the secretary of state shall exercise the same until the next meeting of the general assembly, who shall immediately proceed to elect, by joint ballot of both houses, a person to exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If a vacancy occur in the office of governor, or if the governor-elect die or become disqualified before the commencement of his term, or refuse to take the office, an election for governor shall be held at the next general election, unless the vacancy happen within six days next preceding the election, exclusive of the day of the happening of the vacancy and the day of the election; in that case, if an election for governor would not have been held at said election without the happening of such vacancy, no election for governor shall be held at said election in consequence of such vacancy. If the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor, the governor of the last year, or the speaker of the senate or of the house of representatives, who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority, shall continue therein until a determination of such contested election. The governor shall not be removed from his office for inability but with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members of each branch of the legislature.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very much obliged to my friend the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, this fight centers around these three sections. It may be well to state right here that I do not care what construction you put upon those sections of the constitution of Delaware; "Mr. Du Pont, you can not sit in a seat in this Chamber without destroying the Constitution of the United States." Let it be what construction you please. But as men are more inclined to adopt and consent to a rule which cuts out an applicant from a seat in this body when they are satisfied that on other grounds the applicant is not entitled, we on this side, conceding and believing that any argument made on that subject is dehors the record and unnecessary, go into the argument for the purpose of showing that he is not entitled on the facts of the case without reference to the strict rule which cuts out the Senate from adjudicating upon his title. Of course section 5 of Article III and section 12 of Article II, as I have before stated, taken by themselves prohibit Mr. Watson from exercising the office of governor. I admit that.

Now, the question is, What effect has section 14 of Article III upon that question? The Senator from Oregon made a speech which was admirable in all things but one—admirable in its ability, admirable in the skill with which he manages a very difficult side, but allow me to say, with due respect to my friend, a speech which did not have in it one single solid constitutional truth taken plain and naked by itself. His reasonings are skillful, logical, but always from false premises, as I shall demonstrate before I get through, not only to my own satisfaction, which is very easy to do, but I am not entirely without hope that I can satisfy my candid and ingenuous as well as ingenious friend the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am all attention.

Mr. GEORGE. I know the Senator is. The distinguished Senator from Oregon spoke about the inconsistencies and incongruities and all that sort of thing in the constitution upon the idea that we advance, and he thought he had found a key by which all those inconsistencies and incongruities should be solved. That section of the constitution which has been read says in its first clause:

> Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office.

The distinguished Senator argued and seemed to think, and I have no doubt does think, that if we will just interpolate after the word "speaker" the further words "after vacating his office" everything, every incongruity, every inconsistency, in the constitution would be made harmonious. His contention is that the speaker, not as speaker, exercises the office of governor, but that the constitution merely nominates him or declares that he may be governor. He discards the words "exercise the office of governor" and inserts the words "shall be governor," and my distinguished friend thinks that when he has done that he has removed every inconsistency, every incongruity, in the constitution of Delaware; and everything from that point upon his theory goes along smoothly and easily and consistently.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator a question at this point?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. How does the Senator from Mississippi think he exercises the office of governor? Does he do it as speaker of the senate?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does he exercise the office of governor as speaker of the senate ex officio?

Mr. GEORGE. Of course I wish to answer all questions propounded by the Senator at any time, but I will state to the Senator, without going into any argument upon the point now, that I have a full argument written out showing that to be so. I do not want to go into it now. I have not reached that question.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then the answer of the Senator is "Yes."

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then allow me one other question right here, as I believe it will perhaps fill out the argument of the Senator a little better to present both sides. There have been cases in Delaware where the senatorial term of the speaker of the senate who succeeded to the exercise of the office of governor and his term as speaker of the senate expired long before he ceased to exercise the office of governor. In a case of that kind, his term as senator having expired, his term as speaker of the senate having expired and he is still exercising the office of governor, is he doing it as speaker of the senate?

Mr. GEORGE. I have an argument upon that subject which I know will convince the senator.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. GEORGE. The constitution of the State of Delaware in that very case prolongs his office as speaker, not as senator, until he fully discharges the commission which the constitution has imposed upon him.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is the answer?

Mr. GEORGE. That is the answer I make, and I will make my argument directly. I do not want to make it now.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not think that will do.

Mr. GEORGE. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. GRAY. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that he wait until he has heard the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Oregon has not heard my argument. I hope the Senator, when he comes to consider this matter very seriously, will discover that not only is my position true but that the contrary position is absurd.

I was going back to say that the Senator thought he had found a key which solved all these inconsistencies in the constitution of Delaware. If he could just make the speaker governor and vacate the office of speaker, then everything would go on smoothly. Now, let us see how that is. Let us see if the Senator is not involved in more contradictions and inconsistencies under that view of it than under any other that could possibly be presented. The constitution of the State of Delaware declares—I call the attention of the Senator to this matter—that the governor shall hold his office for the term of four years from the third Tuesday in January. The speaker-governor—I call him governor now—holds for a few months only, from the time the vacancy happens until the new governor is qualified. Is not there an inconsistency? The governor of the State holds for four years while the speaker-governor holds for a few months. That is one.

The constitution of Delaware says that the governor shall be at least 30 years of age. The governor they make out of the speaker may be only 24 years of age. How does the Senator reconcile that? The constitution of Delaware says the governor shall have been an inhabitant and citizen of the United States for twelve years, the last six of the State. This new kind of governor they make of the speaker of the house of representatives and of the senate may be an inhabitant of the State only three years. Now, let us go a little further.

The constitution, Article VII, section 12, says:

> No property qualification shall be necessary for the holding of the office of governor.

That is, for holding any office in the State except certain specified ones, and the governor is not specified. Yet this new governor which they make of the speaker of the senate must have 200 acres of land or other property worth $5,000. There seems to be a little inconsistency and incongruity there.

The constitution of Delaware says "the governor shall be chosen by the citizens of the State," the persons qualified to vote, or in case of a tie, one of the two, by joint ballot, of the two houses. That is the way the governor gets in by the constitution. He is to be chosen from all the citizens of the State who possess the requisite qualifications. He is eligible then to the office of governor. Yet this new governor is elected as speaker by the members of one house alone and from the members of that house alone. In the case of the senate there are just nine and only nine persons in the State of Delaware who can be governor, and they are elected by five persons; that is, a majority of the senate. Does the Senator see no inconsistency, no incongruity, between those two provisions of the constitution?

Next, the governor is elected—that is, selected—for the place or office of governor. That is, when the men vote for him they vote for him to be governor. This new governor that they want to make out of the speaker of the senate is elected for some other duties and may never be governor, and if he gets the office at all it is only by a contingency which may or may not happen. The other man goes in just on his election. Now, how are these various provisions of the constitution, repugnant and contradictory as they are, on the theory of Mr. Du Pont's friends, reconciled?

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will permit me, I will point out another illustration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. GEORGE. Of course.

Mr. GRAY. By the constitution of Delaware a governor is ineligible for reelection, whereas no one can contend that a speaker of the senate exercising the office of governor may not be nominated for governor while he is thus exercising the office and be elected. That case has actually occurred.

Mr. GEORGE. I believe Governor Saulsbury had it consecutively. That is true. These are the inconsistencies which remain under the view of the Senators on the other side.

Now, our theory reconciles everything. It happens to be a theory which not only reconciles this law, but it is a theory which must be applied to every system of laws, human and divine, which was ever reduced to writing. I will read a well-settled canon of construction from the brief of the counsel, and then I will call the attention of those who are paying any attention to this discussion to the point:

> Where there are words expressive of general intention and of a particular intention incompatible with it the particular must be taken as an exception of the general, and so all parts of the act will stand as a particular proposition. General words in one clause may be restrained by particular words in a subsequent clause of the same statute.

Or constitution, or Bible, or anything else. Sir, the Decalogue can not be construed itself without the application of this principle. "Thou shalt not kill." In other parts of the same great book, there is not only permission but command to kill public enemies and those who assault one's life, and yet the Decalogue says, "Thou shalt not kill." There is not a constitution in the United States which must not resort to this rule to be understood. How can the President of the United States and the Senate exercise the legislative power of making a treaty, so far as it is a law, when all legislative power is vested in the Congress except under this rule? The general words are to be qualified and restrained by the particular words. They are to be construed as the exception. There is no way known to man by which any writing whatever can be construed except in that way. You can not construe a contract, you can not construe a will, you can not construe a law, you can not construe a book upon any scientific or other subject without giving the author the benefit of that rule. A general statement, a universal statement, in one part of it is to be considered as qualified by the particular instances contrary to it in others.

Now, we go on to that rule, and what do we find out? The two first sections must be construed as meaning "no person" so and so "shall be" so and so "except as hereinafter provided," and it is hereinafter provided that the speaker shall be so and so.

That brings me to consider the meaning of this very important section 14. I will read only the first clause of it now. The whole of it has been read:

Upon any vacancy happening in the office of governor by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor, elected by the people, shall be duly qualified.

The advocates of Mr. Du Pont say this means the speaker shall "be" governor or "become" governor. We on the other side say that it does not mean this; and we say further that if it did mean, as claimed, that the speaker became governor, actual governor, for the time and under the conditions mentioned in the constitution, it would not make out Mr. Du Pont's case. I shall not discuss that part of the case now, that is, whether if he became governor it would help Mr. Du Pont—I will do so hereafter—because, it being essential to the argument on the other side, if I show that the section does not mean "become governor" or "be governor," their case is lost. To state their position fairly, I quote from the speech of the Senator from Oregon and put that in the RECORD. Referring to section 14, the Senator from Oregon, on page 2818, says:

It declares in legal effect to the person who is speaker of the senate: "You, in a certain contingency—that is, in case of the death, removal, resignation, or inability of the governor elected by the people—have a preference right over every other citizen of the State to become governor and exercise that office, a right, however, you can avail yourself of or not at your own option. There is nothing compulsory connected with it."

Then again, proceeding with the declaration, as he quotes it, of the constitution of Delaware to the speaker of the senate—

"You can waive it if you please," says the constitution in legal effect, "and continue to be senator and speaker of the senate, notwithstanding your eligibility to become governor, notwithstanding you hold the preference right over every other citizen of the State of Delaware to become governor; but if you avail yourself of this preference right given you by the constitution, and take the gubernatorial oath, and enter voluntarily, as you must if you enter at all, upon the exercise of the office of governor, then that moment you cease to be senator, your right to exercise the functions of either senator or speaker of the senate is at once gone, or at least held in abeyance and suspended so long as you continue to exercise the office of governor."

That is the position of the Senator from Oregon. Now, we will see how that stands with the constitution. The first and most obvious comment to be made on this extract is that if the framers of the constitution of Delaware meant that the speaker should "become" governor, it was the easiest thing in the world to say so. The word "become" is an ordinary word, in common use in the signification insisted on by the Senator from Oregon. So is the word "be." The constitution might have said "he shall be governor." Its use here would have saved the employment of many other words which appear to have and do have a different signification. It would also have saved the use of all the words in clause 2 of section 14, referring to the speaker's exercise of the office.

The natural and easy way of expressing the idea that these temporary substitutes became governor in the contingency mentioned would have been to declare "on the happening of any vacancy in the office of governor the speaker of the senate shall become governor [or be governor], and on a further vacancy, or if there be no speaker of the senate, the speaker of the house shall become governor [or be governor] until," etc. Why depart from the ordinary language "be governor" used twice in Article I, section 2, page 28?

The framers of the constitution of Delaware were not unacquainted with the mode of expressing the idea of being governor. Let us see what they said, who they really meant should be governor. Article III, section 2, which is in a section providing for the counting of the votes cast for governor at a general election, provides that—the person having the highest number of votes shall be governor.

There is one place where the framers of the constitution, when they wanted to make a man governor, used the proper language: "He shall be governor." Now, I go on:

But if two or more shall be equal in the highest number of votes the members of the two houses shall by joint ballot choose one of them—to be governor.

To be what?

When the framers of the constitution of Delaware meant to express the idea that on a certain event a man shall be governor they said so. He shall be governor. They shall proceed to elect a man to be governor. Will the Senator from Oregon explain why in section 14, which we are now considering, if it had been the meaning of the framers of the constitution that on the contingency therein named the speaker of the house shall be governor, they did not say so? Instead of saying that they used a phrase which excluded the idea that he was to be governor, the phrase "shall exercise the office of governor," as I shall show before I get through. Instead of this plain and obvious method the very extraordinary language which, if it was intended to express that idea, is used to which I now call attention. The language is on the happening of a vacancy:

The speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified. If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death, removal, resignation, or inability, the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office until, etc.

First, it will be noticed that in describing the second or further vacancy which might happen after the speaker of the senate has commenced to exercise the office—and is, under the view of the opposite side, a real constitutional governor, having become such by such exercise—that further vacancy is to occur, not from the death, resignation, etc., of the governor, as they say the "exerciser" of the office is, but from the death, resignation, removal, etc., of the speaker of the senate then exercising the office, who they say does not exist at that time, having ceased to be such when he entered on the exercise of the governor's office.

Mr. President, if men intended to express the idea contended for by the Senators upon the other side, were they not most unfortunate in the language they used? First, they say the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor, and, second, if there be no speaker, or if that speaker shall die or resign, then the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office of governor. This is the grammatical and also the plain and obvious meaning of the clause. I will call your attention to that:

If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death—

Whose death? Will the Senator answer?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes, sir. The death of the man who was speaker of the senate and who is then governor.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not say that. Here is what it says——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. But it certainly means that.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course it means that if you are allowed to interpolate and obliterate both at the same time.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I obliterate nothing and interpolate nothing.

Mr. GRAY. Strike out and insert.

Mr. GEORGE. Strike out and insert, a motion to amend. The Senator speaks all along on a motion to amend the constitution of Delaware.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Whom does the Senator say it refers to?

Mr. GEORGE. It refers to the speaker.

Mr. GRAY. The constitution says to whom it refers.

Mr. GEORGE. I will read it:

If there be no speaker of the senate, or upon a further vacancy happening in the office by his death—

The death of the speaker of the senate.

Mr. GRAY. The pronoun refers to the noun.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Of course.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the Senator mean upon the death of the speaker before he enters upon the exercise of the office of governor?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no.

Mr. BURROWS. Afterwards.

Mr. GEORGE. Afterwards. The other contingency is taken care of in the phrase "if there be no speaker."

Mr. BURROWS. I merely wanted to understand the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then it means the death of the person exercising the office of governor.

Mr. GEORGE. It means exactly what it says. It means the death of the speaker of the senate.

Mr. BURROWS. After he has entered upon the office.

Mr. GEORGE. After he has entered upon the exercise of the duties of governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That is right.

Mr. GEORGE. "His" must refer to the last antecedent, the speaker of the senate. That is the rule of grammar; it must refer to the last antecedent. It can not refer to the old governor in the first clause, for he is already dead. It does not refer to him. If they intended to refer to him as governor why did they say "speaker" instead of saying "governor." If he became governor, as the Senator contends, upon the devolution upon him of the exercise of the office of governor, why do they continue to call him speaker? Why did they not call him governor if he had become such? If it had been the intent of the framers of the constitution that the speaker of the senate became governor they would have said so in the first clause, and if they had desired to make a new clause for the speaker of the house of representatives the natural and proper way to frame the clause would be to say, "if there be no speaker of the senate." That means, of course everybody will agree, at the time of the death or resignation of the first governor, "or if the office again become vacant by the death or resignation, etc., of tne governor, then the speaker of the house of representatives shall become governor." That is the natural and proper way. If they intended that they committed a fraud upon the English language and upon the people of the State of Delaware by using the language which they did. This is the first trouble our opponents encounter. They will have more as they go along.

It is well to notice now another position taken in the extract from the Senator's speech that I have read. It is claimed that section 14, now being considered, only makes the speaker of the senate "eligible" to become governor, gives him a preference right to become governor, which right he may accept and become governor, or he may refuse and still be speaker of the senate. I admit that this is the necessary and logical result of their position that he becomes governor. My distinguished friend reasons correctly, but always from false premises. When, therefore, I show that this position can not stand with the words of the clause and with other parts of the constitution, I overthrow the whole theory of the other side.

The second clause devolves the right to exercise the office of governor on the speaker of the house of representatives only on two contingencies, and I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to that. It devolves it only on two contingencies, one of which must happen or the exercise of the office can never come to him. The first is expressed in the words, "if there be no speaker," which, without doubt or possible room for controversy, means if there be no speaker of the senate when the vacancy happens. The Senator will agree with me, I know, about that, for notice that the language is "if there be no speaker of the senate," without adding—and I want to call the Senator's attention to that—what is said in clause 3 of the same section, where provision is made not to fill a vacancy, but to prevent one "or refuse to take the office." I want to call attention to that. Recollect the contingency upon which this thing is to go to the speaker of the senate or the house is if there be no speaker, not, as the Senator claims, if he refuses to take the office. Those who are following me in the constitution will commence at the last word on page 29 and read:

> If a person elected governor shall die or become disqualified before the commencement of his term, or shall refuse to take the same, the person holding the office shall continue to exercise, etc.

So when provision is made for a man for the exercise of the office of governor upon a refusal of somebody, the word "refusal" is used. In this phrase there is no refusal and there can be none.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator unless he is willing to be interrupted.

Mr. GEORGE. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question right on the clause which he is discussing now so interestingly. Suppose a governor is elected by the people for the full term and before he takes the oath of office he dies or becomes disqualified.

Mr. GEORGE. Or refuses.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Or refuses to take the oath. A governor is then in office who had been elected previously by the people. This clause provides that in a case of that kind the governor——

Mr. GEORGE. The old governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The old governor shall continue to exercise it.

Mr. GEORGE. But not continue to be governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Well, I will come to that. It provides that the person holding the office shall continue to exercise it until a governor shall be elected and duly qualified. Now, the question I want to put to the Senator from Mississippi is this: Does he, after the regular term has expired, cease to be governor?

Mr. GEORGE. He ceases to be governor in the constitutional sense and becomes a mere exerciser of the office, as I shall show to the Senator before I get through. I have not overlooked that point.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He is governor, then, of the State of Delaware for four years?

Mr. GEORGE. For four years.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Until the time when the other man would have taken the oath of office, and after that, until somebody else comes in to take the office, he is not governor.

Mr. GEORGE. He is the exerciser of the office of governor, and not governor. Though the Senator is making me anticipate some part of my argument, I will state that if they had intended him to continue in the office of governor they would have said in that case—they had the best opportunity in the world to say it—"the person holding the office shall continue to hold it." I will show you before I get through that "hold" always refers to the original legal constitutional incumbent for the full term, and "exercise" always refers to a temporary substitute. I will show you before I get through that if it had been intended to prolong the office of governor they had the best opportunity in the world for doing it.

The person holding the office shall continue to hold the same. That is exactly what they did in another case when they wanted to prolong the office of sheriff and of coroner. The Senator, however, is making me go ahead of my argument. Then they said, when providing for the term of sheriff and coroner, that the sheriff and the coroner shall hold for two years, and hold until their successors are elected.

The second clause devolves the right to exercise the office of governor on the speaker of the house of representatives only on two contingencies, one of which must happen or the exercise of the office can never come to him. I want the Senator to bear that in mind, because that is crucial. If he can break me down on that I will give up that part of the case.

The sole contingency in this part being, "if there be no speaker of the senate" at the time the vacancy happens, then the speaker of the house shall exercise the office. If the speaker of the senate refuse the office and still remain speaker, as the Senator from Oregon contends logically and correctly from his premises, there remains after his refusal a speaker of the senate, for he is speaker still, as my friend says he is, and that being so, the casus of "no speaker" does not exist and the exercise of the office can not go to the speaker of the house, nor can it go to anyone else, as I will show further on.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator a question. You say he may refuse the office of governor and remain speaker. You have got no governor yet. He refuses it. Where are you going to get a governor? You have two contingencies; one is that there be no speaker. That has not happened, because he remains speaker according to your own theory. It does not say—I called the Senator's attention to this a little while ago—in the third clause which I read, if he refuses to accept the office, then it shall go to the speaker of the house of representatives; but it says "if there be no speaker." But you say he is speaker; he remains speaker. How can you jump over the plain language of the constitution of the State of Delaware?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the Senator from Mississippi contend that that clause is compulsory?

Mr. GRAY. Certainly it is.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. And that whether he wills it or not he is compelled to be governor?

Mr. GRAY. Just as much as any other duty belonging to him.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the Senator hold that a constitutional convention can declare that he shall act as governor, either be governor or exercise the office of governor of a State, against his will? Is that the contention?

Mr. GEORGE. I will come to that directly. The Senator keeps getting ahead of me. But just now I will say that if he really vacated the office of senator and became governor, or became acting governor, the Senator is right; but if, as the constitution says, it annexes to the office of speaker the additional duty of exercising the office of governor, he can not refuse to exercise it until he resigns the office of speaker.

Mr. GRAY. And it is compulsory.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is sound.

Mr. GEORGE. I call that to the Senator's attention. I think I shall get every difficulty in his head removed before I get through.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Suppose the term of speaker expires——

Mr. GEORGE. I will answer all that later. It can not go to anyone else, nor can it go to the speaker of the house under the second contingency. There are two contingencies, one if there were no speaker at the time of the happening of the vacancy, and the other if a further vacancy happens upon the resignation of the speaker. It can not go to him under that, for there could be no further or additional vacancy happening unless it had once been filled by the speaker of the senate, and then only "on his resignation, death," etc.

It is the same, original, and only vacancy that happened when the governor died, resigned, etc., as stated in the first clause of the section.

So, under the construction placed on this section by the opposite side, upon the mere refusal of the speaker of the senate to accept, as they call it, the office of governor, all this carefully devised and arranged section to prevent an interregnum in the government of Delaware falls to the ground, is utterly destroyed by the mere exercise of a plain legal right of the speaker of the senate, as they allege, to refuse to accept the office of governor.

No other provision in the constitution supplies this. If so, point it out.

I will point out the only one that looks like it. Let us see if there is any comfort to the Senator and his friends in that. That is found in the fourth clause of that section:

> If upon a vacancy happening in the office of governor there be no other person who can exercise—
>
> Not who will—
> who can exercise said office within the provisions of the constitution, the secretary of state shall exercise the same, etc.

So it does not go to him because there is a person, the speaker of the senate, still in esse who can, if he will, exercise the office of governor of the State. If there is any answer to that, I should like to hear it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am not responsible for any omissions in the constitution of Delaware.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator had given his attention a little more to construing the constitution of Delaware as it was written, instead of framing one as he thinks it ought to have been written, he would not have fallen into that mistake.

A construction against the plain and clear meaning of the words used, adopted only to meet an objection coming from a fancied theory as to the proper mode of making a constitution, can not be adopted when it involves such absurdities in the construction of a constitution already made—made, too, upon a clear and express disregard of that theory.

In opposition to this view we say that on the happening of the vacancy no office is tendered to anyone, no preference right to fill an office is given; no acceptance or refusal of an office is either contemplated or tolerated; no qualification of an officer is required. The only office named or contemplated is the speaker of the senate. The words used, "the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office of governor," in their plain and obvious sense commands that speaker, that officer, to perform certain official duties which the public good requires to be performed, the officer primarily charged with them—that is, the governor—no longer being in existence. The speaker can not lawfully refuse to perform them any more than he can refuse to perform any other duty imposed on him by the constitution and laws of Delaware. If he refuse to perform these duties he is guilty of a high misdemeanor in his office of speaker, for which he may be impeached or removed from office—removed from the office of speaker, not of governor, because he never held that office. He can resign if he does not like the superadded duties, but if he does he must resign the office of speaker. That relieves him from the exercise of the office of governor. But he can not resign that "exercise" alone; it belongs to his office as speaker; for if he could resign that exercise, he still being speaker, the exercise would immediately come back to him as speaker, or it would be lost forever. It could go nowhere else, as I have shown.

But it is said in opposition to this view that the speaker took an oath to perform the duties of the office of governor, and that showed he was governor. The journal of the senate was read to show that he took such oath. I answer, the oath was purely voluntary. There is no provision of law requiring him to take it. The oath for all officers in Delaware is exactly the same. I will read that. All officers in that State take the same oath:

> Members of the general assembly and all officers, executive and judicial, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the constitution of this State and to perform the duties of their respective offices with fidelity.

That is the only oath required by the constitution of Delaware to be taken by any officer of the State, except in two instances, which I shall point out, and neither of them is the speaker of the senate.

If he was sworn again he repeated only an oath he had already taken. An oath once taken is as binding and effectual as if repeated every day or thrice a day.

There is no provision in the constitution of Delaware for any additional oath to any public officer when new duties are imposed not appendant to his office except in two instances.

One instance is the oath required to be taken by senators on trying an impeachment (see Article V, section 1), and the other is that imposed on members of the legislature who are selected to try the case of a contest for governor (see Article III, section 2, last clause). In these two cases extraordinary duties are imposed on the senators and representatives of a judicial nature, and the constitution requires an additional oath. But in these cases the oath did not install them into new offices nor vacate their old ones. They were still senators and representatives, exercising an extraordinary duty imposed on them by the constitution as senators and representatives, and they retain their character as such.

This ought to dispose of the oath voluntarily taken by Speaker Watson, for it is certain that no man can swear himself into an office to which he has not been designated, nor create an office not established by law for him by taking an oath not authorized by law to perform the duties of such nonexistent office. But the advocates of Mr. Du Pont seek to maintain his cause by another equally unwarranted assumption. The Senator from Oregon referred to the third clause of section 14, and I think my friend from Oregon, from the way that he talked about this, put a good deal of stress upon it. That clause is in the following words:

> If the person elected governor shall die, or become disqualified before the commencement of his term of office, or shall refuse to take the same, the person holding the office shall continue to exercise it until a governor shall be elected and duly qualified.

And the Senator from Oregon with, as I thought, an air of triumph, claimed that in this clause, in the words "holding the office," there was a distinct recognition and assertion in the constitution that the speaker, exercising the office of governor, was in fact governor and held the office of governor. It is only a hasty and careless reading of section 14 that could have misled the Senator from Oregon. An analysis of that section shows that the third clause, relied on by him, does not and can not refer to the speaker exercising the office of governor. In the first place, this clause does not assume to supply a vacancy in the office of governor, but to prevent one. The speaker's sole connection with the office of governor is to supply or fill a vacancy which has already occurred. He has no right anywhere in the constitution to exercise the office except where a vacancy has first occurred by either the death, removal, resignation, or inability of the governor and by which occurrence he gets his sole power to exercise the office. He gets this power under the first clause of the section, and that clause continues his power to exercise the office, not merely till a governor is elected, but in express terms (I quote literally) "until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified." It is the qualification of an elected governor, and nothing else, that terminates his exercise of the office. If an elected governor for any cause, whether by death, resignation, refusal to accept, or by any other means, fails to qualify, then there is no governor elected by the people who has been duly qualified, and until this due qualification takes place the speaker's right and duty to exercise the office are not terminated. So that this third clause can not refer to the speaker exercising the office. To say it refers to him is to attribute to the framers of the constitution pure nonsense and an absurdity, because the commission originally got under the first clause of the section extended all over the period which this third clause was intended to supply.

It does not refer to the speaker. That is clear. Now, to whom does it refer? The framers of the constitution of Delaware, I must suggest to my friend from Oregon, used the English language with somewhat of care as to its force and meaning. It refers to the only person named in the constitution as having the right and power to exercise the office, and whose right to exercise the office would be extended or in the least affected by the clause in question. That person also is the only person who in the constitution of Delaware is ever spoken of as "holding" the office of governor or called governor or declared to be governor. That person is the governor elected by the citizens of the whole State, or in case of a tie, then chosen by the legislature on joint ballot from the two persons having the highest and an equal number of votes. His term of office is four years from the third Tuesday in January of an odd-numbered year. At that last date his successor has been elected and ought to qualify. If he does not qualify—for any cause mentioned or for any cause—if the regularly elected governor be then in office, or, as the clause says, "holding the office," there would be an interregnum but for this clause, for the old governor holds for four years only.

Every substitute holds over the term, until a new governor qualifies. The governor is the only one who stops with the end of his four years. If any substitute provided for in the constitution be then exercising the office, he, whoever he may be, would, by the express provision of the clause which gave him the authority to exercise the office, continue such exercise till the qualification of a newly elected governor, without depending in the least upon this clause of the constitution.

Those provisions of the constitution to which I have just referred contain in themselves an unanswerable demonstration that "holding" the office of governor in this third clause of section 14 does not in any way refer to the speaker of the senate or the speaker of the house of representatives exercising the office of governor. But this third clause does, indeed, in using the words "the person holding the office shall continue to exercise it until," etc., show unmistakably that the words "hold" and "exercise" have in the constitution of Delaware a distinctly different signification, clearly marked and carefully preserved.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, he admits that a case might occur, and perhaps has occurred heretofore in Delaware, where the speaker of the senate has succeeded to the exercise of the office of governor and is in the exercise of that office at a time when there has been a failure of the governor-elect to qualify.

Mr. GEORGE. I think so. I think he holds on.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then under what clause of the constitution does he hold on?

Mr. GEORGE. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There is nothing in the clause, it seems to me, which the Senator has just read, which would justify the interpretation that it relates only to the governor who had been elected by the people holding the office.

Mr. GEORGE. Every single substitute or ad interim or provisional exerciser of the office of governor under the clause of the constitution from which he gets his power to exercise the office holds it not only until the election of the governor but until the governor-elect qualifies; and so if a new governor-elect should refuse to qualify the ad interim officer holds until there is a qualification.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That may be true; but this clause in a case like that undoubtedly refers to the person then in office as well, it seems to me.

Mr. GEORGE. It can not refer to a person as holding the office who never held it; it can not refer to the exerciser of the office, because he holds it without reference to that clause. That answers the Senator. This distinction is not accidental or casual, but is preserved throughout that instrument. This distinction is that "hold an office" always refers to the original incumbent selected in the mode prescribed in the constitution for a full term, while universally an officer clothed by the constitution with power to perform the duties of another and distinct office, or authorized to perform duties belonging to another office, is always so clothed, so authorized to do so by the use of the words "exercise the office" or "exercise the powers" vested in another officer. In other words, "exercise the office" or "exercise the powers of an office" refers to an officer already holding an office, who, by these words, is made for a limited time, in a particular emergency, the "exerciser" of duties which do not ordinarily attach to him in the office he holds.

In this very third clause this distinction is clearly marked. It is not said that the "person holding the office" shall continue to hold it "until a new governor is qualified." That would have been the natural and obvious way in which to express the idea of a prolongation of the original term of the office. That is the way in which is expressed the prolongation of the terms of the only two officers whose terms are prolonged or extended by the constitution of Delaware. In Article VII, section 3, it is provided that the sheriff and coroner "shall hold their respective offices for two years * * * and until their successors are duly qualified," thus making them full constitutional officers, entitled to their official names, not only for the term of two years, but also for the additional time which might intervene between the expiration of the two years and the qualification of their successors.

That is the only instance in Delaware where there is provision made to prolong the constitutional office of the incumbent. They have adopted that language in one place, and why should they not have adopted it in another if they meant the same thing?

Why this was not done in this third clause is to be accounted for only on the idea that the constitution had already, in Article III, section 3, said "that the governor shall hold his office for four years," and that the framers of the constitution would not prolong it. They meant to use that person so holding the office to prevent an interregnum in the contingency mentioned, but to accomplish this in the same way exactly that they had provided for preventing an interregnum in the same office in other contingencies by other officers, the speakers of the senate and house and secretary of state; so at the expense of changing the phraseology and using some circumlocution they substituted "exercise" for "hold."

I now show how "exercise" and "hold" are used in the constitution of Delaware.

If the Senator from Oregon, or any other Senator who wants to follow this argument closely, will refer to the constitution of Delaware, Article III, section 3, he will find that—> the governor shall hold his office during four years—

Not exercise it, but shall hold it.

Article VI, section 14, provides that—> the chancellor and the judges shall respectively hold their offices during good behavior.

Article VII, section 1:

> The sheriff and the coroner shall hold their respective offices for two years.

These are all for original terms.

In filling vacancies in the senate and house, where the new man is elected in the same way as the old, and is necessarily from the nature of his office a full officer, the word hold is used. You can not have a provisional ad interim representative or senator. He is a full senator or he is a full representative. So when the constitution comes to speak of filling vacancies in the office of senator or representative, the language is different from that in any other part of the constitution as to filling vacancies, for it is said as to the new man that he shall "hold."

Mr. GRAY. He is to be elected by the people, in the same way as the original man was elected.

Mr. GEORGE. In the same way.

Article II, section 13, provides:

> When vacancies happen in either house writs of election shall be issued * * * and the persons chosen shall hold their seats—

Not exercise their office.

Mr. President, I have shown that wherever the constitution of Delaware refers to the occupancy or holding or exercise of the original term, when he is elected and comes in in the regular constitutional way, it always says he holds his office or holds his seat. Now I mean to say that when they refer to an ad interim, a provisional man, they always say "exercise."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Not always, if the Senator will allow me. I think that if the Senator will turn to section 16, page 27——

Mr. GRAY. Section 16?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Section 16 of Article II, in regard to the State treasurer. It says:

> The State treasurer shall be appointed biennially by the house of representatives, with the concurrence of the senate. In case of vacancy in the office of State treasurer in the recess of the general assembly, either through omission of the general assembly to appoint or by the death, removal out of the State, resignation, or inability of the State treasurer, or his failure to give security, the governor shall fill the vacancy by appointment, to continue until the next meeting of the general assembly.

Mr. GEORGE. It is continuing the appointment. That is all. That is an exception. But everything else is as I have stated. I admit that that is an exception.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I just happened to see that section.

Mr. GEORGE. Let us come to section 13 of Article VI, and see how this theory of mine runs out, and how the Senator's theory will come, making "exercise" "hold":

> Until the general assembly shall otherwise provide, the chancellor shall exercise all the powers which any law of the State vests in the chancellor, besides the general powers of the court of chancery.

That is where extraordinary powers are conferred upon a regular-named officer. Here is another:

> And the chief justice and associate judges shall each singly exercise all the powers which any law of this State vests in the judges singly of the supreme court or court of common pleas.

By this constitution the supreme court and the court of common pleas were abolished, so that if the Senator's construction of the exercise of the powers of an office be correct, it had the effect in this case to resurrect two dead offices, which were abolished by the constitution.

The speaker "shall exercise." The secretary of state shall "exercise" in case of vacancy. The person holding the office of governor shall continue to "exercise." If there be no person who can exercise the office, the secretary of state shall exercise it. That is another vacancy. The governor of last year shall exercise. That is a clear case. I have not called the attention of the Senate to that point, but I tell you the constitution is full of refutations, and you can not put your finger down without finding a refutation of the Senator's theory. Let us see. We will get to that directly. I want to call the Senator's attention to it.

"If the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor"—that is the time when he has to be installed under the constitution—"the governor of the last year," etc. Now, it names him, instead of as before holding the office, "governor of the last year." He is not to continue to be governor, but he shall continue to exercise the office of governor or the executive authority in that case. This ought to be conclusive. But it is said that the effect of section 14, article III, is only to make the speaker eligible to become governor. That is the distinct position of the committee and of the Senator from Oregon. How eligible, except by dispensing with the conditions which are prescribed in the constitution as qualifications for the office and adopting those prescribed in section 14? That is the only way you can do it. There is no other mode known to man in which eligibility to become governor can be effected by section 14. That eligibility consists in the fact, and in that fact alone, "that he is speaker of the senate," when the vacancy occurs. If there be any other claim I would be glad to have it mentioned here and now. I ask for a statement.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There is no other claim.

Mr. GEORGE. There is no other claim. That is right.

Then we reach the point that being speaker constitutes the eligibility to become governor. Yet the contention is that as soon as the speaker so made eligible to exercise the office—or, if the other side prefer, to become governor—accedes to the place, his eligibility is lost—gone forever. Or put it more sharply, the fact or condition of being speaker constitutes his sole eligibility to exercise the office or to become governor. As soon as he becomes governor he loses his eligibility, and is therefore no longer eligible to the place. Does this logic need refutation? And yet that is the exact position of the other side.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the exact position of the other side is simply that the constitution makes him eligible to become governor just as a man who may be 30 years of age and who has the other necessary qualifications is eligible to become governor.

Mr. GEORGE. Would it not be singular if then, as soon as he becomes 30 years of age, he loses the qualification?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Oh, no——

Mr. GRAY. Ceases to be 30 years of age?

Mr. GEORGE. I should like very much to get into the office of governor of Delaware if it would put me back twenty or thirty years, under the construction which the Senator from Oregon puts on this clause.

THE ARGUMENT TO SUSTAIN OUR VIEW.

Up to this point I have been mainly engaged in answering objections of our opponents to our construction of the constitution of Delaware, without stating the argument fully on our side.

I now do this more fully, and in doing so will answer other objections.

We are to construe the constitution by giving force to each word in it in its plain and ordinary signification, unless the context shows that some other specific meaning was intended.

Recalling that the word "hold," without exception, is used in its ordinary sense—the possession of an office by an actual, legal incumbent, selected in the mode prescribed for a full term named in the constitution—and that "exercise" is always used to describe that which a provisional and ad interim substitute may do in supplying a vacancy, I proceed with this duty.

Referring to section 14 of Article III, we find that on the happening of a vacancy in the office of governor the provision is that "the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified."

The language is mandatory, not permissive—the speaker "shall exercise" it. He has no option; he must exercise it or incur the condemnation of disobedience to the constitution, which he has sworn to obey. The constitution in this very section avers that there may be "no speaker." The speakership always exists, but there can not be a speaker unless there be a person in esse who has been chosen to that office in pursuance of the constitution, and who still, at the very moment spoken of, holds the office. The union or connection between the office and the officer who holds it is indissoluble. The fact that a person actually holds the office is the essential fact to constitute him speaker. When he enters the office he becomes speaker; when he goes out of the office he is no longer speaker. So that speaker always means the officer who, at the time indicated, holds the office. We may conceive of the office without an incumbent; it is then the "speakership." But it is inconceivable that there should be a "speaker" who does not hold the office—that is, who is not an officer filling the speakership.

So that when a duty is imposed on the speaker it is always imposed on the officer who holds the speakership, and when a mandate is laid on the speaker it is laid on the officer, to be obeyed by the officer, and by no one else. Where the mandate is a continuing one, requiring for its observance the doing of a series of acts to be performed during a considerable period of time, when he ceases to be speaker the mandate no longer applies to him, unless his office be continued pro hac vice to enable him to obey it, but in that case he is still speaker so far as the execution of the mandate is concerned.

The command in the constitution is that the speaker—the officer—shall exercise the office of governor. If we construe this to mean that he shall be speaker at the moment the mandate is laid on him, but from that moment he ceases to be speaker, then it is certain that it is not the speaker but an ex-speaker that exercises the office when the constitution says the speaker shall do it.

In that case we reach this absurd conclusion: That the constitution selects the officer—the speaker—to exercise the office of governor, commands him eo nomine to exercise it, and then at the moment he begins the exercise the constitution says he shall no longer be speaker, and he shall exercise the office, not as speaker, as he is commanded to do, but as one who has been but is no longer speaker.

I can not think the great ability of the distinguished Senator from Oregon can make this proposition acceptable to anyone who has not determined beforehand that he will reject no proposition, however absurd, which may be necessary to seat Mr. Du Pont.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I understood the Senator from Mississippi to state at the outset that if there were in the constitution no other provisions bearing upon this subject than section 12 of Article II and section 5 of Article III, there would be ground for holding that Mr. Du Pont is entitled to his seat.

Mr. GEORGE. No; not that. There would be ground not for holding that Mr. Du Pont is entitled to his seat, because there are many other things on which he may be excluded, which I will show the Senator before I get through, but for holding that Mr. Watson was not a proper member of the legislature.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I wish to ask a question which I will premise by a statement of a word or two. The Senator has been at least an hour in trying to demonstrate the falsity of the argument of the other side by pointing out that the word "hold" is used in the Delaware constitution whenever applied to an original incumbent. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to a fact, and then to ask him if it does not destroy that argument altogether. In the first place, section 5 of Article III and section 12 of Article II, contain these provisions:

No * * * person holding any office under the United States, or this State, etc.

There the word "holding" is used—

No person * * * except officers in the militia, holding no disqualifying office, shall, during his continuance in Congress or in office, be a senator or representative.

There the word "holding" is used.

Then section 5 says:

No member of Congress nor person holding any office * * * shall exercise the office of governor.

The Senator has stated that if those two clauses stood alone and there was no other reason why Mr. Du Pont should not be seated, he thinks he ought to be seated, as I understand him. It refers to the speaker of the senate as holding an office.

Mr. GEORGE. The speaker of the senate does hold an office.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The speaker of the senate as holding the office of governor.

Mr. GEORGE. No; it does not.

Mr. GRAY. No.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Where?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Or else the Senator's admission is not well grounded.

Mr. GEORGE. Where does it say that the speaker holds the office of governor?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator must put that construction upon it or else it amounts to nothing.

Mr. GEORGE. There is nothing in that argument. Read the clause where you say it is plainly inferable that the constitution of Delaware says that the speaker of the senate holds the office of governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Both of those clauses in speaking of both members of the legislature and governor speak of them as holding the office.

Mr. GEORGE. Holding the office of what? Not of governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. One as holding the office of governor and the other as holding the office of legislator.

Mr. GEORGE. That is what I have said all along. When, however, it speaks of the original incumbent it says "hold." Whenever it speaks of an ad interim, a provisional officer to take care of the office during the interim, it says "exercise."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. This applies as well to a person who succeeds to the exercise of the office as to a man who is elected governor.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not see it. I do not understand the Senator's argument.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Oregon is begging the question.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Oh, no.

Mr. GRAY. That is the very question we have been discussing, and the Senator from Oregon says the clause in the constitution to which he refers is as applicable to a person who exercises the office as to one who holds the office.

Mr. GEORGE. I defy the Senator from Oregon, or any other Senator who advocates his side of the question, to put his finger on that clause of the constitution which says anything about the speaker of the senate holding the office of governor under any circumstances whatever. It is not in the constitution. If you get it in there you interpolate it. If you get it in there you not only interpolate it, but you obliterate language which is directly opposed to it.

On this point I will add that "become" governor, as the phrase is in the constitution of Pennsylvania, is altogether an instantaneous operation and can not be repeated. If a man once becomes governor, he is, without any further "becoming," governor till the end of his term. He does not become governor anew every time he performs an official act. On the other hand, the act of "exercising" the office of governor is performed every time an official duty is performed till the end, so that when the constitution commands the speaker, the officer, to exercise the office of governor, it commands that speaker, that officer, not only to perform the first official act as speaker, but every other official act, up to and including the last.

Clear as this reasoning makes out the case against Mr. Du Pont, yet the importance of this matter is such, not only to the people of Delaware but to the friends of constitutional government everywhere, I feel that I ought to adduce a further argument which in my judgment settles this controversy.

THE AMENDED CONSTITUTION.

The present constitution of Delaware, in numerous instances, refers to itself as "the amended constitution," and to changes made by it in the prior constitution of 1792 as "amendments to the constitution." We therefore can, and even must, under a well-recognized rule of construction, refer to the former as a proper aid in construing the later and amended constitution. Doing this, we find a provision in the former constitution (of 1792) which makes it absolutely certain, if certainty already attained can be made more certain, that the command in section 14 of the present constitution, which we are now construing—"the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office" of governor—is addressed to him in his official character as speaker and not to him as a person. In that constitution of 1792 a provision is made to fill a vacancy in the office of governor happening at a time when there was no speaker of the senate or of the house, and no other officer in whom the framers of the constitution were willing to vest the exercise of the office. They found themselves under a necessity to give this exercise to a person without reference to any official position he then held.

They did this in the following language: "The executive authority shall devolve upon the person who was speaker of the council at the next preceding session of the general assembly," and then "on the person who was speaker of the house of assembly at the said next preceding session."

Mr. GRAY. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. GEORGE. I am reading from the old constitution.

Mr. GRAY. What part of it?

Mr. GEORGE. I have not the page here.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The old constitution?

Mr. GEORGE. The preceding constitution.

Mr. GRAY. The one that was amended.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The constitution of 1792.

Mr. GEORGE. There can be no mistake about this meaning. This language to designate a person, not an officer, had by this use in the constitution of 1792 become naturalized—if I may use the expression—at all events, had been adopted as the constitutional form of expression for the idea that the devolution was on the person. And so if the framers of the constitution of 1831, having this old constitution before them and amending it, had meant to express the same idea they would have used the old, recognized constitutional language already adopted for that purpose instead of language which meant exactly the contrary.

Another provision in the constitution of 1792 makes the construction we contend for so plain that when it is called to the attention of the Senator from Oregon I indulge the hope, with some confidence, that he will abandon Mr. Du Pont's case and allow the people of Delaware to enjoy and live under their constitution as they made it.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. There is one clause of the constitution on which I should like to hear the Senator, if it will not disturb him.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will call my attention to it, although I will not say I will do it now, I will do so before I get through.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. It is section 1 of Article III. It is very short, containing only 13 words:

The supreme executive powers of the State shall be vested in a governor.

When the speaker of the senate succeeds to the exercise of the office of governor, I understand the argument on the Senator's side to be that he is not governor. Where are the supreme executive powers of the State vested then during the time he exercises the office of governor?

Mr. GEORGE. The Constitution of the United States says the executive power of the United States shall be vested in the President of the United States, and before the framers of that instrument get through with that section they authorize Congress to provide by law for a person to act as President in case of the resignation, disability, or death of the President and Vice-President. In 1792 Congress, in pursuance of that provision, named as the officer to act as President the President pro tempore of the Senate, and it has never been held or suggested, but on the contrary everybody admits that that man, although he would act as President, would not be President of the United States. He would act as President, and if he acts as President he must exercise the powers of President. If he exercises the powers of President and still remains simply the President pro tempore of the Senate, as is admitted on all hands here, I do not see why it could not be done in the State of Delaware.

There is another answer to that question, and if the Senator will wait until I get through he will see it all answered. The office of governor was vacant. This is a temporary provision to prevent an interregnum by the selection of another officer, not to be governor, but to exercise the powers of governor. While he may exercise the supreme executive power vested in the governor, he is not governor, because the constitution says he is not. That is all there is in that.

Mr. BURROWS. Will it trouble the Senator from Mississippi if I ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly not.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand the Senator to contend that Watson was a senator?

Mr. GEORGE. A senator.

Mr. BURROWS. Holding an office?

Mr. GEORGE. Holding an office.

Mr. BURROWS. And simply exercising the office of governor?

Mr. GEORGE. That is what I contend.

Mr. BURROWS. I was not in when the Senator explained the fifth section of Article III, which says that no person holding any office under the State shall exercise the office of governor. How can he exercise the office of governor if he is holding another office?

Mr. GEORGE. In virtue, as I explained here at great length, of the exception made to that by the positive provisions of section 14.

Right here, since I have been interrupted, it reminds me that I ought to call the attention of the Senators who have taken so much interest in this matter, very much to my gratification, to another provision in the constitution. They have paid some attention to what I was remarking here, and I call their attention to another provision of the constitution of Delaware, which I omitted in the proper place. I think when they get over that they will have some trouble.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If it is of so much importance the Senator ought not to have forgotten it.

Mr. GEORGE. I did pass it over.

Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers.

Section 12 of the same article provides that—

No * * * person holding any office under this State * * * shall be a senator or representative.

When they elected a senator speaker of the senate how do you reconcile it with the positive prohibition in the twelfth section? He is an officer.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I reconcile it by the fact that as soon as he becomes a governor he ceases to be senator.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not talking about governor. I am talking about the provision which I will read. I have not made myself fully understood.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Probably not.

Mr. GEORGE. Section 12 provides that—

No * * * person holding any office under this State * * * shall be a senator or representative.

I have left out a good deal, but that is the substance of it.

Section 5 of the same article says:

The house shall choose its speaker and other officers.

Now, how can the speaker of the senate, when chosen to that office, be a member without violating section 12, which I have just read? Do you say he is not an officer?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He is an officer.

Mr. GEORGE. How, then, can the senate of Delaware elect one of the senators to the office of president without violating section 12 of the constitution, which provides that no person holding any office under the State shall be a senator or representative? Does the Senator think he vacates the office of senator when he is elected speaker of the senate?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. My impression is that there is a clause in the constitution which provides that they shall elect one of their own number speaker.

Mr. GEORGE. It is not in there. It only comes in there by virtue of common parliamentary law.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then that is a part of the law of the State.

Mr. GEORGE. If that be so, if we can read section 5——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. My impression is there is a direct clause in the constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. There is not.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Have you examined it carefully?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes. It is not there. Now, then, we are to read section 5 as if it read this way: "Each house shall choose its speaker from its own members and other officers." That is what the Senator means, then?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. While the office of speaker is an office in one sense it is not an office under the State. He is a senator, and simply by virtue of the fact that he is senator and in virtue of parliamentary law he is selected to preside over the senate. That is all there is to it.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator deny that he is an officer under the State of Delaware?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He is not a distinct officer under the State of Delaware. He is not an officer under the State of Delaware within the meaning of that clause of the constitution, in my judgment.

Mr. GEORGE. That may be so, if you want to put any meaning to it, but he is an officer under the State of Delaware.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He is a State senator; that is the office he holds, and by virtue of that office and only by virtue of that office and by the consent of his fellows, he is permitted to preside and exercise the duties of speaker.

Mr. GEORGE. Do you deny that the office of the speaker, then, is a distinct office from senator?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The Senator can designate it as he likes.

Mr. GEORGE. Here is the way it reads: "Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers." What does the phrase "other officers" mean if it does not mean the speaker as an officer?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then there is a distinct provision, just as I supposed there was, authorizing them to select one of their number as a speaker.

Mr. GEORGE. If a distinct provision authorizes the senate of Delaware to elect one of its senators to a distinct office under the State of Delaware in contravention of Article XII, section 2, which I have read, why may not section 14 require the same speaker to exercise the office of governor? I should like to have that explained. Here is the constitution of Delaware, which says, "No person holding any office under the State." That is the word used. Let me see if it is not "any":

No person * * * holding any office under this State * * * shall * * * be a senator or representative.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The trouble with the Senator from Mississippi is that he is now trying to construe the constitution of Delaware by simply taking one clause instead of taking the two clauses of the constitution together.

Mr. GEORGE. I am taking it all together. I am going to show by taking them all together that it lets Mr. Watson in as speaker of the senate as well as it lets him in as a member of the legislature, holding the office of speaker.

Now, if anybody denies that he was speaker, the constitution expressly refers to him as speaker. I call attention to that point. It is not an honorary office. It is an office with certain specified, distinct duties as speaker. He can issue a writ of election. That is a pretty high function for him to perform. I will tell you another thing he can do, and it will help the Senator along a little, I think, in his incongruities of this constitution. I want to call attention to it. In the first place, I want to call attention to the fact that he is called an officer directly.

The returns of every election for governor shall be sealed up and immediately delivered by the returning officers of the several counties to the speaker of the senate, or, in case of the vacancy of the office of the speaker of the senate—

Then it shall go to somebody else. I want to tell you another great power which the speaker has which seems to be, according to my friend from Oregon, a very incongruous and inconsistent thing. This very same speaker, when there is a tie in the popular vote for governor and that is referred to the legislature, as speaker and as senator votes for one of the two for governor, and when there is a tie there, he votes again for governor.

Mr. LINDSAY. It is New Hampshire over again.

Mr. GRAY. That is a pretty important office.

Mr. GEORGE. A pretty important office.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The only trouble between the Senator from Mississippi and myself in regard to these two offices, if you choose to call them so—that is, governor and speaker of the senate—is that I insist there is an express provision of the constitution which authorizes the senate of the State of Delaware to choose one of their own number speaker.

Mr. GEORGE. But it is not in there.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I am stating my claim. I will make my claim and then I will hear the Senator's, and we will see the difference. I insist that there is an express provision in the constitution authorizing that thing to be done, and, therefore, that provision must be taken in connection with the other provision which says that—

No person * * * holding any office under this State * * * shall * * * be a senator.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is exactly right about that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then, on the other hand, the Senator from Mississippi claims that there is an express provision, as I understand him, authorizing that same speaker to exercise the office of governor. I admit that, but I contend that the moment he takes the oath of office as governor and enters upon the exercise of that office, then he ceases absolutely to be speaker.

Mr. GEORGE. Why did not the speaker when elected speaker of the senate vacate that office under the same kind of constitutional rule?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. For the simple reason that in one case there is absolute incompatibility, as I think, while in the other case there is complete compatibility.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, Mr. President, I supposed the Senator would land on that. There is no incompatibility between the legislative officer exercising, as I have shown already here in my argument, the executive office. There is none whatever at common law, and none under the constitution, unless there be an express provision to that effect. If the Senator from Oregon, or any other Senator who listens to me who wishes to reply to anything I have said on this subject, will show to me how he understands that there is incompatibility at common law between the exercise of the office of a member of the legislature and an executive officer, I should like to have him do so.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator from Mississippi mean by incompatibility?

Mr. GEORGE. I am trying to mean exactly what the Senator from Oregon means, an incompatibility which means he can not hold two offices, a legal incompatibility, such an incompatibility as prevents one man from holding both offices. That is what I mean.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know whether the Senator from Mississippi intended his invitation to any other Senator to accept now.

Mr. GEORGE. You may go on if you desire to do it.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me the answer to the Senator's proposition is not a difficult one. Of course, nobody expects to take these constitutional provisions with the literal exactness of phrase that you apply to a plea in abatement or to a demonstration in logic. For instance, when the constitution of Delaware says that no person holding any office under the State shall exercise the office of governor, I suppose my honorable friend himself, unless he were driven into a very small corner indeed, would not claim that it meant the person who held the office of governor.

I suppose something is applied between the lines in all constitutions, especially in so excellent a State as Delaware, and words have a little common sense in construing this instrument; otherwise it will not work. When they say that the senate or the house of representatives may choose its own presiding officer, although they say in the same instrument that no person holding any office under the State shall be a senator or a representative, they are speaking of legislative bodies, in which the uniform practice of all mankind that have free governing bodies is that the presiding officer is taken from among the members, and a speaker of the house of representatives or president of the senate is expected as a matter of course to be one of the number, except in the few instances where States have provided the contrary. It would, I suppose, shock the whole sense of the country if we were to choose a President pro tempore of this body who was not a member of the Senate, though there is nothing that I now recall in the Constitution which prevents it. So you construe it. Even the Senator from Mississippi does not claim to construe that provision as prohibiting a Senator from being chosen to the office of presiding officer, or acting as such, whatever particular phraseology has been used.

On the other hand, when you come to take a member of a legislative body and make him governor of a State or President of the United States, you have got two offices in regard to which the universal sense of the country is declared. In all constitutions the universal sense of the people of that generation, as declared in writers whom they followed and studied, like Montesquieu and Sidney, both of whom have very strong statements on this subject, is that the two things shall not go together; that the man who is to make laws shall not execute them. Therefore, when you inquire in regard to these two offices, whether the man who held an executive office should not be a legislator, and the reverse applies to the one or the other, you have got a general proposition where, as a matter of course, the presiding officer of a body is to be taken from the body by the universal understanding of mankind. You have got another where, with the exception which, if I am not trespassing too much on the patience of the Senator, I will state presently—as a matter of course the two men can not do the same thing at once, and therefore, when the question comes whether the exercising the one vacates the other, the general proposition of the constitution applies, and there is no reason why it should not. Applying the general proposition of the constitution to that carries out the universal desire of the American constitutions framed in all the States in the nation and the universal principle which applies to such things.

I do not claim that the two offices are absolutely incompatible in the sense that the two things can not be done, as when you would say that an office to be performed in Washington and an office to be performed in London at the same time are incompatible, but I mean incompatible according to the established policies of the people of that generation in framing governments.

Now, there is one exception to that which I should like to state if I am not abusing my honorable friend's courtesy, and he is very courteous in allowing me to make this statement. He invited it himself. There are certain cases which the people of the United States provided for which you may speak of perhaps as vacancies in the second, or third, or fourth degree. Of course the country or a State can not go on without somebody all the time capable of acting as the chief officer, commanding the troops, seeing that the laws are faithfully executed, and doing all the other numerous functions that are attached to the chief executive office. In general, the people have provided for the case of a vacancy by death or inability by having one man set apart to be ready in the contingency which has happened, I think, four times in our national history, and which has happened in all our States, to step into the office of the chief executive.

In Massachusetts the lieutenant-governor is the president of the council and acts as one of the council of the State. In the United States the Vice-President is President of the Senate and presides over this body. We do not take our Vice-President from the body itself, as was expected. He is kept on hand and set apart from all other things. But you can not go on forever in that way. There might come a pestilence or an invasion by an enemy or a calamity like the explosion of the steamer on the Potomac River that happened years ago, where the President and Vice-President would both be killed. That might happen, perhaps, once in three or four centuries, as it happened here in one hundred and seven years of this Government. It never happened, I believe, in a single State of the Union that the governor and lieutenant-governor both died at the same time, but still in that most extraordinary and unexpected and unlikely contingency our ancestors did not leave the thing to be without some remedy, and in that case they said, "We must, of course, take some existing officer and let him, whatever may be the inconveniences, add the duties of chief executive to that of his existing office."

That is what they did in the Constitution of the United States. They said that if the President and Vice-President both died Congress should determine what officer should act as President, and, as I stated once before on a very important occasion, in my judgment in that case, however inconvenient it must be by the law providing for the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House succeeding, while constitutional, of which I express no opinion now, the President of the Senate must have acted as President of the United States, and we could have changed him every morning. They took that risk. The Constitution did not put that officer in. The Constitution simply said that Congress might designate the officer, but the first Congress, owing to the dislike of Mr. Jefferson, who was then Secretary of State, did not want to make the present arrangement that we have, and made the provision for the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House. That, however, was one of the vacancies which I spoke of just now as vacancies in the second degree; and if he died the Speaker of the House would succeed.

Now, in regard to this Delaware case, it is an original primary vacancy; a common case, which has happened some four or five times in the history of the United States. It has happened, I think, six times in the history of my State. It has happened four or five times, I believe, in the history of Delaware already.

Mr. BURROWS. Nine times.

Mr. HOAR. It has happened nine times, my friend says, in the history of Delaware. Therefore, when we are construing the Delaware constitution we look at what they intended to provide for a common case, and their opinion was that in common cases senators should not be governors and governors should not be senators or representatives. It seems to me that the doctrine which is applicable to this case, as they have stated in so many words, is that when they say "hold the office" and when they say "exercise the office" they mean the same thing. That is clear by looking at this constitution. They say that no man who is a senator shall exercise the office of governor. That they have said in this constitution. Now, then, when you are looking to see whether the particular provision, that the speaker of the senate, as they call him there, shall succeed, is governed by that general rule or no, it seems to me you can find the answer by seeing that all the reasons which could have made then establish that general rule in providing for an original vacancy in the first degree applied to that.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for occupying time enough for me to get a little rest for I was very much tired. But the Senator wandered from the point in the very beginning of his remarks. It is when a constitutional and express provision says that no person holding an office under the State of Delaware shall be a senator, and that by construction the president of the senate, who is an officer, is allowed to retain his office as senator, why can not the same express provision of the constitution, which says the speaker of the house of representatives shall exercise the office of speaker without losing his office of senator, apply to that case? The rule, as I pointed it out in the first part of my remarks, is that general provisions in the constitution are always to be modified and limited by particular provisions, and when the general rule was that no officer under the State shall be a senator or representative then the special rule that a speaker provided for in the constitution as senator should also hold the office of senator, is an exception from the other.

Referring now to the old constitution of Delaware of 1792, I proceed. That constitution, as to the section now in controversy—that is, section 14 is the same as this. That constitution, in case of vacancy in the office of governor, commands, as this does, "that the speaker of the senate shall exercise the office." These words mean the same thing in that constitution that they do in this. The constitution of 1792 put a construction on these words utterly repugnant to the construction put on them by the advocates of Mr. Du Pont, in a clause which provides that in case of the death, resignation, or inability, or absence from the State of the governor (there called president), the speaker of the legislative council (and in case of his death, resignation, or absence from the State, the speaker of the house of assembly) shall, respectively, with the privy council, exercise the executive authority of the State "till the third Tuesday in January next."

Under the construction of Mr. Du Pont's advocates this would give to the State of Delaware five actual governors at one time; the privy council, consisting of four, with, in case of the absence of the president and of the speaker of the council, two additional governors in posse—quite a number of governors for so small a State as Delaware. The same construction of words as adopted by the Senator from Oregon applied to the constitution of Massachusetts would give that State eight governors to fill a vacancy in that office provided for one only.

If executing the powers of the office of governor makes a man governor, then, under the constitution of Massachusetts, as I have just stated, they would have eight governors. Article VI of chapter 2 of the constitution of Massachusetts says:

ART. VI. Whenever the office of the governor and lieutenant-governor shall be vacant by reason of death, absence, or otherwise, then the council, or the major part of them, shall, during such vacancy, have full power and authority to do and execute all and every such acts, matters, and things as the governor or the lieutenant-governor might or could, by virtue of this constitution, do or execute, if they, or either of them, were personally present.

If the power to execute the duties of the office of governor makes a man governor as it is insisted in this case that it does, then under the constitution of Massachusetts in case of a vacancy in the office of governor and lieutenant-governor the council does that thing, and, therefore, there would be eight or nine who would all be governors at the same time.

Nor can the other side avoid the force of this by stating that in the clause quoted from the constitution of 1792 the words used are "shall exercise the executive authority," while in the section we are now considering the words are "shall exercise the office of governor" for "exercise the executive authority," and "exercise the office of governor," in whom the executive authority is vested, are exactly of the same force and signification. And this is expressly recognized by the present constitution of Delaware we are now considering, in the last clause of this same section 14, wherein it is declared that in a certain contingency named in it "the governor of the last year, or the speaker of the senate, or of the house of representatives, who may then be in the exercise (not of the office of governor, but of its exact equivalent) of the executive authority, shall continue therein," etc.

But strong and conclusive as this is, I have not as yet called attention to the full significance of this last quotation made from this same section 14. I want to read that so that the Senator from Oregon may see the utter want of force in his contention.

If the trial of a contested election shall continue longer than until the third Tuesday of January next ensuing the election of a governor—

That is the time when the governor's office commences—

the governor of the last year, or the speaker of the senate or of the house of representatives, who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority, shall continue therein until a determination of such contested election.

This occurs, as has been seen by the mere reading of it, in a clause framed to prevent an interregnum in the executive authority in a contingency which had not before been mentioned in the constitution. It was designed to prolong and recognize the prolongation of the authority of a person to exercise the executive authority in the contingency named.

It provides—

First. That the regular governor, if there be one, shall continue not indeed to hold but to exercise the executive authority.

Second. That the speaker of the senate or of the house who may THEN be in the exercise of executive authority shall continue in it.

Now, in this clause are two distinct and unequivocal assertions of facts, each and both of which destroy Mr. Du Pont's case—destroy it forever without possibility of resurrection.

One is express and the other a necessary implication, each of which and both of which are false assertions made with deliberation in the constitution itself if the position of Mr. Du Pont's advocates be correct.

The first, express, is that on the third Tuesday of January, the ordinary end of the exercise by the speaker of the senate or of the house of the executive authority, he is still at the end speaker exercising that authority. The language is, "The speaker of the senate or house, who may then (on the third Tuesday of January) be in the exercise of the executive authority." This is a false assertion if he ceased to be speaker months before on his entry on, at the moment he began, this exercise. There can be no doubt of this proposition. I challenge its contradiction here and now.

The next assertion is made by necessary implication, and is that a speaker exercising the executive authority is not governor; for if he were governor, if he became governor on his entry into the exercise of that office, he so remained as long as he continued that exercise, and hence was governor on the third Tuesday of January, and was named and included in the words "governor of the last year" just as fully as a governor elected by the people is so named. Therefore, on that construction, the addition of the words "speaker of the senate or of the house then exercising the executive authority" was not only unnecessary, but pure and unmitigated and also misleading nonsense. And I now add, with absolute confidence that what I say can not be overthrown, that as the speaker of either house, under clause 1 of this section commanding him to exercise the office till a governor elected by the people should be duly qualified—this last clause we are now considering—as to him, the speaker, could have no other effect and no other purpose than to put in the constitution a clear and unequivocal expression as to the true construction to be placed on his exercise of the executive authority; that he was not governor, but was, up to the end of such exercise, speaker, and nothing else than speaker. It could not extend or prolong his exercise of the executive authority as it did that of the governor of the last year, for it already extended to the period mentioned—the end of the contest—for there could be no qualification of the newly elected governor till it was ascertained who was elected; and that ascertainment was the determination of the contest.

Constitutions are designed to furnish as the fundamental law a rule of action not only to the people who are governed but for those who govern them. They should be framed so as to be as easily understood as human writings can be. They are not designed to furnish riddles or puzzles or questions to be solved only by the exercise of extraordinary aptitude for clearing up the dark and mysterious. The framers, therefore, of such instruments are under the highest and most solemn obligation to so do their work that the task of ascertaining what is meant in a clear and certain sense shall not be beyond the powers of the ordinarily intelligent. The people ought to be able to understand what all their officers, high or low, are sworn to support.

A careful consideration of the constitution of Delaware impresses me that its framers understood their duty as I have explained it and faithfully performed it.

So, inspired by these sentiments, as I believe they were, when they came to frame this last clause in section 14, in reference to ad interim and provisional substitutes for governor, there came an opportunity to remove all doubt as to their meaning on this subject. If they meant that this substitute should be governor—should hold the office of governor—they had then the opportunity and it was their plain duty to stop at the words "the governor of the last year" in designating the instrument to exercise the executive authority till the determination of the contest. That would have removed all doubt and would have included "speaker of the senate or of the house" if the intent and meaning of the former provisions were that these officers should become governor when the executive authority devolved on them. But they did not do this; but acting on this idea, and on that alone—to make clear the meaning of the constitution—they inserted after the words "the governor of last year" the words "or the speaker of the senate or of the house who may then be in the exercise of the executive authority." By this they asserted, as I have shown beyond doubt, that the speaker so acceding to the exercise of the office of governor under the first clause of this section acceded to duty and power superadded to his office as speaker, which duty and power he performed and exercised as speaker till the very end.

If there be any answer to this I am unable to see it, and I respectfully ask my friend the distinguished Senator from Oregon to state it.

This last clause upon which I have just commented contains a provision—necessarily involved in its plain meaning and easily perceived when attention is called to it—which I think I ought to call to the attention of the Senate. It answers beyond controversy the objection made by the opposition—that the speaker could not as speaker exercise the office of governor after the termination of his regular official term as speaker. I admit there is plausibility in this objection, but mere plausibility can not overturn the positive commands of the constitution. The constitution says not only that the speaker can but that he "shall" so exercise the executive authority "until a governor elected by the people shall be duly qualified." And I submit that what the constitution commands must be obeyed. In this very clause the power of the governor of the last year—after he had ceased to be governor—is continued beyond his term, and identically the same thing is done in clause 3 of the same section. I have shown beyond controversy that the speaker eo nomine in his official character in the beginning of the vacancy exercised the executive authority and that at the end of his service the constitution asserts that he is still speaker at that time in the exercise of that authority.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator allow me just there?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Suppose in the meantime—which may be the case—a new senate comes in and elects another speaker, then there would be two speakers, would there not?

Mr. GEORGE. That is all provided for. I will answer all of that.

Can the friends of Mr. Du Pont, in construing this very constitution containing this express and unequivocal assertion, deny that the constitution itself is to be heard? They claim that these provisions, construed in their plain and necessary meaning, would give the senate of Delaware, after the legislature met, two speakers, and that would be an altogether incongruous and incompatible arrangement. The Senator will see now, I think, that he is answered.

All provisions to supply a temporary and unlooked-for vacancy in the office of the chief executive of a State are necessarily incongruous and inconsistent with other parts of the constitution, and must be held to be exceptions to general provisions when that officer is elected by the people, as all of them in the United States now are. There must be great delay in having a new election by the people, but the exercise of the powers of the office must constantly go on; there must be no interregnum; there must be some person to execute the laws, or to take care that the laws are faithfully executed; there must be no anarchy. So provisions incongruous and inconsistent with other parts of the constitution must necessarily be made. Another officer must be selected for this particular emergency arising outside of the regular, normal administration of the government. In doing this, the selected officer may be transferred to the governor's office and displaced from his old office, or the selected officer may be merely endowed in his official character with the exercise of executive duties. Either and both are inconsistent with the other parts of the constitution. Both are incongruities, but the first is the greater of the two, for in that case an officer elected by one branch of the legislature—it may be the senate, where the votes of five men (in Delaware) would create him, or by some small constituency much less than one-half the State—is deprived of the office to which he was elected and for which he has the constitutional qualifications, and the right of his constituents to his service in that office taken away, and he is transferred to and placed in an office for the whole State, to which he was not chosen, without regard to his want of constitutional qualifications for that office. What greater incongruity than this?

But to return more directly to the objection about two speakers.

It is not certain by any means that the senate of Delaware would have two speakers on the construction of the constitution that we contend for. The permission in the constitution given to elect a speaker pro tempore when the speaker exercises the office of governor is limited only by the termination of such exercise. I will read that provision of the constitution of Delaware:

SECTION 5, ARTICLE II.

Each house shall choose its speaker and other officers; and also each house, whose speaker shall exercise the office of governor, may choose a speaker pro tempore.

Read it, ponder it, and you can get no other limitation than that while the speaker is exercising the office of governor the legislative body may have a speaker pro tempore. Such is the construction of the constitution of Pennsylvania of 1838, which is exactly like the constitution of Delaware on this point. Here is a case which I will read from the brief of counsel against Mr. Du Pont:

On July 9, 1848, the general assembly of Pennsylvania not being in session, Governor Shunk resigned, and William F. Johnston, who was chosen as speaker of the senate at the last preceding session, took an oath faithfully to discharge the executive duties, and entered upon the exercise of the office of governor. The general assembly met on January 2, 1849. In the meantime an election for governor had been held, and Mr. Johnston had become governor-elect, but his term as governor did not begin till January 17, 1849. When the general assembly met, George Darsie was chosen by the senate as speaker pro tempore, and Mr. Johnston's name appears in the journal as that of a senator whose term was to continue till 1850.

But still more unequivocal are the following extracts from the senate journal of January 13, 1849, showing what Mr. Johnston, who was then exercising the office of governor, did in anticipation of his inauguration as elective governor on the 17th of the month:

To the honorable the senate of Pennsylvania:

SENATORS: I hereby tender my resignation as speaker of the senate of Pennsylvania. * * *

I remain, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. F. JOHNSTON.

JANUARY 13, 1849.

He had been in the exercise of the duties of the office of governor, under a provision in the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania exactly like the constitution of Delaware, since July 9, 1848. He resigned the office, and his resignation was accepted on the same day, when he addressed the following letter to the speaker of the senate:

JANUARY 13, 1849.

SIR: Permit me, through your kindness, to present to the senate my resignation as a member of that body.

I am, truly yours, WM. F. JOHNSTON.

To the Hon. GEORGE DARSIE, Speaker of the Senate.

These communications having been disposed of, Mr. Darsie resigned the office of speaker pro tempore and was elected speaker.

But if there were at the same time that the speaker is exercising the executive authority a new speaker—a full speaker is elected—then we would have in Delaware, to meet an emergency for a short time, only what they have in Rhode Island as the regular normal condition, two regular constitutional presiding officers, one with right to preside all the time, and the other with right to preside in the absence of the other. I think I had better read that provision of the constitution of Rhode Island to show that it is not so much of an incongruity after all.

SEC. 2. The governor, and in his absence the lieutenant-governor, shall preside in the senate and in grand committee. The presiding officer of the senate and grand committee shall have a right to vote in case of equal division, but not otherwise.

I read that for the purpose of showing that in the State of Rhode Island they have two regular constitutional presiding officers all the time. I read it also to show that it is not altogether such an incongruous, incompatible, and unrepublican provision that the governor of a State should be actually the presiding officer of one body of the legislature.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I make a suggestion to the Senator at that point, which has just occurred to me, and which I have not heard suggested by anybody else?

Mr. GEORGE. What is the suggestion?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the theory of the Senator be correct, that this man can be senator, speaker of the senate, and governor all at one and the same time——

Mr. TURPIE. Nobody claims that.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The senate of the State of Delaware have certain prerogatives, certain rights that they can exercise, and certain duties which they are compelled to perform under certain circumstances, as, for instance, they can send for and issue writs of arrest for members. Now, the question I wish to put to the Senator from Mississippi is this: Suppose Mr. Watson—Senator Watson, Governor Watson, Speaker Watson—while in his gubernatorial office, exercising the office of governor, refuses to respond to a call of the senate, can the senate of Delaware issue a writ and send the sergeant-at-arms into the gubernatorial office, arrest the governor of the State, and bring him into the senate?

Mr. GEORGE. If he remains senator, he is subject to all the rules and regulations by which other senators are governed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. He, while exercising the office of governor, is also commander-in-chief of the militia of the State, except in a certain case. Suppose there is an insurrection going on and he is at the head of the militia, or he is commander-in-chief, can the senate then send their writ with their sergeant-at-arms and bring the commander-in-chief of the forces of the State, the governor of the State, into the senate, and compel him to perform senatorial duties?

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask the Senator from Oregon a question there?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to get an answer to that question.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will get an answer to it; but in case under the act of 1792 the President pro tempore of the Senate had been acting as President, and as such was Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, while he was on board a ship commanding it, or at the head of the Army, with his cocked hat on his head and his sword by his side, I will ask the Senator from Oregon whether the Senate of the United States could, according to his theory and that of the Senator from Massachusetts, send the sergeant-at-arms and bring him here, for I understand the Senator from Massachusetts has said this afternoon that such a person continued to be a Senator of the United States?

Mr. HOAR. That is the reason why we changed that law.

Mr. GRAY. But that was the effect of the law; and we have not changed the law in Delaware.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I supposed the Senator from Delaware lived entirely too far south to come back at me in Yankee fashion, answering my question by asking another.
